Senator Morton sent the following dispatch to Governor Hayes:

I congratulate you upon your nomination for the Presidency, and shall labor earnestly for your success.

O. P. MORTON.

Secretary Bristow also telegraphed Governor Hayes as follows:

Governor R. B. Hayes, Columbus, Ohio:

I beg you to accept my earnest and hearty congratulations. Your nomination secures victory in November.

B. H. BRISTOW.

Immediately upon the receipt of the news in Harrisburg of the nomination of General Hayes the following dispatch was sent:

HARRISBURG, PA., June 16, 1876.

General R. B. Hayes, Columbus, Ohio:

I most sincerely congratulate you on your nomination. Pennsylvania will surely give you her vote in November.

J. F. HARTRANFT.

The following dispatch from Senator Conkling to Governor Hayes was sent immediately after the nomination of the latter was announced:

JUNE 16, 1876.

Governor Hayes, Columbus, Ohio:

I heartily congratulate the country, the Republican party, and you on your nomination. You need no assurance of the cordiality of my support.

Sincerely yours,

ROSCOE CONKLING.

Shortly after the nomination of Governor Hayes, the Kentucky delegation received the following telegram from Colonel Bristow:

WASHINGTON, June 16, 1876.

Hon. James M. Harlan:

I congratulate the Convention on its good work in nominating Governor Hayes, and I rejoice that my friends have helped to do it. You have secured a victory for us in November by giving us a true man for whom every Republican can vote.

B. H. BRISTOW.

HON. RICHARD SMITH TO MR. BRISTOW.

CINCINNATI, June 16, 1876.

Hon. B. H. Bristow, Washington, D. C.:

You were not nominated, but your honored name, your grand achievements, and the patriotism of your friends saved the party and the country.

RICHARD SMITH.

ONWARD.

The march of the Republican party is to be onward! The critical period in its career has been passed. Political sagacity and unselfish patriotism have triumphed in the abandonment at Cincinnati of all personal considerations and factional interests, in the all-absorbing desire to secure a ticket that would command universal confidence and assure the nation that the great party of freedom was still to move onward in the path of progress, united in all needed reforms, inspired by a common loyalty, and presenting an unbroken front to the enemies of good government.

For this self abnegation, the surrendering of personal favorites, and the unanimity displayed by all when the choice of the convention was made known, the delegates of the several States deserve and will receive the thanks and gratitude of the country. They bridged over our only danger, and made certain a victory which to many good citizens had hitherto been regarded as doubtful.

The House of Representatives was lost by a defensive campaign. It will be recovered by the aggressive one now made possible. Under Hayes and Wheeler there will be no retreats sounded, no forced entrenchment of position, but a steady and irresistible forward movement that will not cease until every State lost is recovered, and every position captured by Democracy is again under the Republican flag.

To believe otherwise would be to insult the intelligence and patriotism of the nation. Even those who have acted in good faith against the party, believing that Democracy had reformed and was capable of administering the Government, must have become convinced of their error by the repetition of follies on the part of the House of Representatives equal, if not surpassing, those which drove the Democracy from power in 1860.

If it has done nothing more, the Democratic party has at least opened the eyes of tens of thousands to its utter incapacity to even legislate for the interest of the nation. Under its control needed legislation has been denied; the appropriation bills necessary to carry on the Government have been suspended; absolutely nothing has been done except to waste millions of the people's money in investigations conceived in partisan malice and carried on for the sole purpose of securing for the Democratic party cheap political capital for the Presidential campaign.

Good citizens everywhere have watched these proceedings with anxiety and disgust, and will hail with rejoicing the prospect, now offered, of a deliverance from the misrule which if long continued would bankrupt the nation and cover its name with disgrace and reproach.

All hail to the awakened patriotism of the people, and to the standard bearers chosen to lead them out of darkness into light! Let every banner have inscribed upon it, "union of good men for the preservation of good government." Let every honest citizen lay aside petty jealousies and local disputes, and join with his neighbors in making the work thorough and effective. Let organization be effected in every town, county, and State throughout the land. Induce, through personal canvass, every citizen to join in the work who believes that loyalty is better than disloyalty, and good government more to be desired than bad government. The enemy is desperate and well organized, and will not hesitate to take every advantage that can be obtained through fraud, violence, and deception. To defeat their schemes, to repel every attack, to beat them on the skirmish line and in open battle, requires courage, unity of action, and a patriotism such as saved the nation when the rebel allies of Democracy tried for four years to destroy it.

These elements of strength exist in our party. If they are dormant the promise which comes from the names of Hayes and Wheeler should excite them to activity. If they have been withheld since the close of the war, the common danger which threatens the Republic from the ascendancy of Democracy should arouse them to again volunteer for the general defense. The Republican party has chosen a man to lead it worthy of its principles. We call upon the friends of law and order to make the victory under him as glorious as any in our history.

AN ENCOURAGING OUTLOOK.

The old army is again united. From the highest officer to the soldier in the ranks the determination is general to join hands in the work to be done in the Presidential campaign and to follow the banner of Hayes and Wheeler to a glorious victory in November next.

Encouragement comes from all quarters. North, South, East, and West send cheering assurances of a spirit of unity in the Republican party such as has not been known since the fiery trials of the war period. The names of Hayes and Wheeler have been accepted everywhere as the promise of reform wherever needed, and as the pledge that loyalty and ability are to guard in the future, as in the past, the interests of the Government.

The Convention has done its duty well. Its delegates will receive from their constituents heartfelt thanks, and be long remembered as patriots who laid aside personal likes and dislikes for the public welfare. The platform has the true ring, the men placed upon it are of the right stamp, and, if we mistake not the necessities of the hour, the work performed will take its place in history as second, at least, if not equal, to the patriotic labors that gave Lincoln to the nation in 1860.

The work of the Convention ended with the selection of the ticket. The work of the people has just commenced. Will it be performed wisely and well? We believe it will, for never before in our history were the people—the loyal people—more in earnest to protect the Government from the fatal effects of Democratic control than at the present time.

Among intelligent men the conclusion is almost universal that the Democratic party, as shown by its transactions in the House of Representatives, is totally unfit to govern the nation, and that to continue its present power over legislation, or to extend it over the functions of the Executive branch, would be little short of national suicide. The popular feeling that carried Democracy into power in 1874 no longer exists. Those who believed it true to the Government and able to legislate for its best interests have opened their eyes to the fatal error into which they were led. They see the Democratic party holding one branch of the National Legislature, and using its power therein, not for the purpose of advancing the country, but for the sole purpose of advancing its selfish and partisan interests. They are forced to the conclusion that Democracy is as corrupt to-day as when it was driven from power, and as disloyal in its affiliation as when the guns of the rebel army were turned against the authority of the nation.

We may therefore reasonably expect large accessions from the disaffected element which left our party a few years since, and positive activity from thousands throughout the land, who, under the false belief that the two parties were about the same, grew apathetic in the support of Republicanism.

The opposition will be composed of the ex-Confederate element in the South, the ignorant and bigoted voters of the North, and that large class of unprincipled men found with Democracy at all times, urging its claims, directing its movements, and sharing in its plunder whenever successful. The power of this opposition should not be underrated. It would be folly to accept the superiority of our party as proof positive that it will be victorious in the pending campaign. Throughout the land every safeguard must be adopted, every weak point must be strengthened, every movement of the enemy watched. Vigilance must be practiced everywhere. Those who believe that law and order are better than misrule and anarchy should band together for the common defense. Organization should be commenced at once. Through it, the true state of affairs, wherever Democracy has obtained control, should be made known to the people. Documents—giving facts and figures that cannot be denied—should be circulated. Weekly meetings should be held by Republicans in every town, city, and county in the land, so that when the great battle is fought in November it will be, what it must be in reality, simply a struggle between the forces of enlightenment and public virtue and the forces of ignorance and vice. There is victory in the air! Let the loyal people prove by their labors that they deserve to achieve it.

THE TWO PARTIES.—The Republican party has been upon trial for the past fifteen years, and what has it shown? The grandest record of good deeds, substantial reforms, and official integrity ever presented in history. Its responsibilities have been greater than any party was ever before called upon to bear. Its trusts have been sacred in their character. It has held in its keeping personal liberty, the rights and privileges of individuals, and the very existence of the nation. It has expended and collected thousands of millions for the common defense and general welfare, and has shown in all of its transactions a regard for the people who trusted it, and for whose protection it was organized. Surely if noble deeds and great achievements entitle a party to consideration, the Republican party has earned by its splendid career the thanks and gratitude of the civilized world. Look now at the record of Democracy! Its repeated betrayal of public confidence; its treasonable sympathies and open aid to rebellion; its oppression of the blacks in the Southern States; its affiliation with such plunderers as Tweed; its illy concealed sympathy for the lost cause; and its total want of appreciation of the public wants as shown in its stupid transactions in the present House of Representatives, stamp it as the worst possible organization that ever courted public favor.

Is it a difficult thing for the loyal citizen to choose between the two parties? Can any man who wishes well for his country hesitate to support the one and oppose the other? No! With the history of the two parties so clearly written, and so well understood, every citizen can draw the line for himself. If he favors good government, the peace and security of all, the development of our national resources, and the growth of our free institutions, he must of necessity advocate and support the Republican party. If these have no charms for him, and he seeks evil rather than good, then he belongs to Democracy, and should be found with it.

EXTRADITION—MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT.

The following is the message of the President, submitted to Congress June 20, in relation to the Winslow extradition:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

By the tenth article of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed in Washington on the 9th day of August, 1842, it was agreed that the two Governments should, upon mutual requisitions respectively made, deliver up to justice all persons, who, being charged with certain crimes there in enumerated, committed within the jurisdiction of either, should seek an asylum or be found within the territory of the other.

The only condition or limitation contained in the treaty, to the reciprocal obligations thus to deliver up the fugitive, was that it should be done only upon such evidence of criminality as according to the laws of the fugitive place, where the fugitive or person so charged should be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the crime or offense had there been committed.

In the month of February last a requisition was duly made, in pursuance of the provisions of the treaty, by this Government upon that of Great Britain for the surrender of one Ezra D. Winslow, charged with extensive forgery and the utterance of forged paper, committed within the jurisdiction of the United States, who had sought asylum and was found within the territory of her Britannic Majesty, and was apprehended in London. The evidence of the criminality of the fugitive was duly furnished and heard, and being found sufficient to justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the crimes had been committed in Great Britain, he was held and committed for extradition.

Her Majesty's Government, however, did not deliver up the fugitive in accordance with the terms of the treaty, notwithstanding every requirement thereof had been met on the part of the United States; but instead of surrendering the fugitive demanded certain assurances or stipulations not mentioned to its provisions, or compliance by Great Britain under the treaty. I have now to lay before the House my answer to a call upon me on this case, and the evidence which has been furnished by the two Governments with reference to the facts of the case, as presented to the House of Representatives at its last session, and for more detailed consideration of the question.

It appears from the correspondence that the British Government bases its refusal to surrender the fugitive, and its demand for stipulations or assurances from this Government, on the requirement of a purely domestic enactment of the British Parliament passed in the year 1870.

This act was brought to the notice of this Government shortly after its enactment, and her Majesty's Government was advised that the United States understood it as giving continued effect to the existing engagements under the treaty of 1842, for the extradition of criminals, and with this knowledge on its part and without dissent from the declared views of the United States as to the unchanged nature of the reciprocal rights and obligations of the two powers under the treaty Great Britain has continued to make requisitions and to grant surrenders in numerous instances, without suggestion that it was contemplated to depart from the practice under this treaty, which has obtained for more than thirty years until now, for the first time in this case of Winslow, it is assumed that under this act of Parliament, her Majesty may require a stipulation or agreement not provided for in the treaty as a condition of the observance by her Government of its treaty obligations toward this country.

This I have felt it my duty emphatically to repel.

In addition to the case of Winslow, requisition was also made by this Government on that of Great Britain for the surrender of Charles J. Brent, also charged with forgery committed in the United States, and found in Great Britain. The evidence of the criminality was duly heard, and the fugitive committed for extradition.

A similar stipulation to that demanded in Winslow's case was also asked in Brent's, and was likewise refused.

It is with extreme regret that I am now called upon to announce to you that her Majesty's Government has finally released both of these fugitives, Winslow and Brent, and set them at liberty, thus omitting to comply with the provisions and requirements of the treaty under which the extradition of fugitive criminals is made between the two Governments.

The position thus taken by the British Government, if adhered to, cannot but be regarded as the abrogation and annulment of the article of the treaty on extradition.

Under these circumstances, it will not, in my judgment, comport with the dignity of self-respect of this Government to make demands upon that Government for the surrender of fugitive criminals, nor to entertain any requisition of that character from that Government under the treaty.

It will be a cause of deep regret if a treaty which has been thus beneficial in its practical operations, which has worked so well and so efficiently, and which, notwithstanding the exciting and at times violent political disturbances of which both countries have been the scene during its existence, has given rise to no complaints on the part of either Government against either its spirit or its provisions, should be abruptly terminated.

It has tended to the protection of society and to the general interests of both countries, and its violation or annulment would be a retrograde step in international intercourse. I have been anxious and have made the effort to enlarge its scope and to make a new treaty which would be a still more efficient agent for the punishment and prevention of crime. At the same time I have felt it my duty to decline to entertain a proposition made by Great Britain, pending its refusal to execute the existing treaty, to amend it by practically conceding by treaty the identical conditions which that Government demands under its act of Parliament.

In addition to the impossibility of the United States entering upon negotiations under the menace of an intended violation or a refusal to execute the terms of an existing treaty, I deemed it unadvisable to treat of only the one amendment proposed by Great Britain, while the United States desires an enlargement of the list of crimes for which extradition may be asked, and other improvements which experience has shown might be embodied in a new treaty.

It is for the wisdom of Congress to determine whether the article of the treaty relating to extradition is to be any longer regarded as obligatory upon the Government of the United States, or as forming part of the supreme law of the land. Should the attitude of the British Government remain unchanged I shall not, without an expression of the wish of Congress that I should do so, take any action either in making or granting requisitions for the surrender of fugitive criminals under the treaty of 1842.

Respectfully submitted.

REBELS ON INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Since the Union was preserved by the Republican party, and the national credit has advanced under Republican influence until it has become as stable as the Great Republic itself, the country is confronted with a House of Representatives a majority of which is composed of ex-Confederates and sympathizing Democrats. Who do the ex-Confederates represent? They appear in the light of National Representatives, and claim to be such; but, judging from the action of the Democratic leaders and their rebel colleagues, the representation in the lower House of Congress is confined to admiration of little else than what sprang out of the rebellion, and to heaping favors of support on the men who did their best to destroy the Union and carry dismay and death into the households of American citizens.

One of the first events announced on the assembly of the Confederate Congress of 1875-'6 was the proud intention to investigate the Republican party. On the investigating committees every rebel was to find a place; and on some of the committees the rebels were so prominent that they quite outshone their Democratic colleagues. But what a sight! Have the people duly considered what is passing at the Capitol at this very hour in this connection! The leaders of the Democracy were in close association with the leaders of the rebellion, and had not patriotism enough to sound the note of warning that the country was in danger. The Republican party met the armed hosts of treason and hurled them back until the people rallied from every quarter of the land, save the South, and boldly stood in the front determined to conquer or to die. Multitudes fell; but their ranks were speedily filled up again; and with the destruction of slavery, the cause of the war, the Confederacy collapsed; but unfortunately treason was not made odious as it should have been by making an example of some who had turned their arms against the nation.

The country was rescued from the unholy grasp of treason only to find sitting in judgment upon its rescuers and preservers the

REBELS ON INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Since the Union was preserved by the Republican party, and the national credit has advanced under Republican influence until it has become as stable as the Great Republic itself, the country is confronted with a House of Representatives a majority of which is composed of ex-Confederates and sympathizing Democrats. Who do the ex-Confederates represent? One of the first events announced on the assembly of the Confederate Congress of 1875-'6 was the proud intention to investigate the Republican party. On the investigating committees every rebel was to find a place; and on some of the committees the rebels were so prominent that they quite outshone their Democratic colleagues. But what a sight! Have the people duly considered what is passing at the Capitol at this very hour in this connection! The leaders of the Democracy were in close association with the leaders of the rebellion, and had not patriotism enough to sound the note of warning that the country was in danger. The Republican party met the armed hosts of treason and hurled them back until the people rallied from every quarter of the land, save the South, and boldly stood in the front determined to conquer or to die. Multitudes fell; but their ranks were speedily filled up again; and with the destruction of slavery, the cause of the war, the Confederacy collapsed; but unfortunately treason was not made odious as it should have been by making an example of some who had turned their arms against the nation.

The country was rescued from the unholy grasp of treason only to find sitting in judgment upon its rescuers and preservers the men red handed with a brother's blood, who had confederated and conspired together to destroy it. Never in the history of humanity was such an anomaly known. Never were the spared foes of a people elevated to the judgment seat to pass upon the quality of the service of the men who spared their lives and let them go free! But to-day Confederates are sitting on Congressional committees investigating all sorts of trumped-up charges against Republicans. If Republicans had failed to do their duty when the Union was imperiled by Southern rebels and their Democratic allies there would be no country which the Confederates could be said to represent, except a kind of Southern colony, perhaps under the presidency of Mr. Ben. Hill as the successor of Mr. Jeff. Davis, and Mr. Robert Toombs, the fiery Vice President, in the place of Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, with every man, woman, and child in whose veins was African blood rolled together for a corner-stone of slavery, and all this in spite of their paternity and of their bearing the names of some of the bluest blooded people of the South—from the hue of ebony to that of the octoroon—the very cream of the F. F. V.'s or of any other Southern State in the group, which the world would laugh at as a Power.

What can be expected of Confederate committee men when possessing the power to express their opinion upon the worth and patriotism of Republicans. Persons guilty of rebellion, especially when causeless and unsuccessful, can have no delicacy of feeling, no manliness of sentiment. They have not therefore shown any. Almost all the committees have been conducted in one way. Evidence has been taken to the discredit of Republicans, and published without giving an opportunity to the parties affected to be heard. Explanatory evidence may be taken afterward, but the delay in publication has often been so tardy that the evil still remains uncorrected. Then again, the Committee on Naval Affairs has sat with closed doors. What is the evidence worth if no one is present to cross-examine or direct the investigation? The Confederates and Democrats on a committee sit with the purpose of convicting Republicans. If they sat with the simple object to ascertain the truth they would be willing to allow the parties charged to be heard before sending out one particle of testimony to their injury. Hon. W. C. Whitthorne, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, has been asked more than once by Mr. Robeson, the Secretary of the Navy, to have the committee open its doors to the public. There is always danger and injustice in secret sessions. This is made clear in one of the letters of the Secretary to Mr. Whitthorne. He says:

“The publication of portions of the unfinished testimony in detached parts has, as was to be expected, afforded the opportunity for charges and insinuations made in the public newspapers utterly false in fact and founded upon false inferences from the testimony as published, which will fall at once to the ground when the whole facts are known. Under these circumstances I demand, as a matter of public right, not only for myself, but for any officer of my Department against whom anything is supposed to appear, a full and speedy opportunity to be heard in justification of every matter charged and in refutation of every false inference that can possibly be made; and I also demand that this hearing be had in open session of the committee, to the end that public justification may follow as speedily as possibly the charges and insinuations made.”

This is a very proper demand. With a Confederate Congress, open sessions of its investigating committees are an absolute necessity. Without open sessions, the reports of such committees are untrustworthy, and full of scandal and assertion unsupported by proof; and as they can only be of use as campaign documents, the people are informed of what is being done in their name and at their expense, and warned to reject at once in the name of justice every calumny against upright public servants belonging to the Republican party, who have in doing their duty shamed the members of the late Confederacy and the Democrats consorting with them.

SIGNIFICANT.—The nomination of two such men as Hayes and Wheeler to the two highest offices in the nation is a clear indication that the Republican party is determined to deserve the confidence and support of the intelligence and patriotism of the country; and the popular verdict is that they will not be disappointed.

THE CHINESE IN AMERICA.

An issue has been made in the Senate which must command the respectful consideration of the American people. Senator A. A. Sargent, of California, has presented the case of his constituents as against the unrestrained migration to our shores of a Chinese population in a form and with a seriousness of aspect that compels careful attention to the burden of his complaint.

The issues involved are of transcendent importance—to the present and future both—at least of our Pacific States, and probably of the entire country. Embraced within the question of Mongolian participation in our life and nationality will be found to be a reconsideration of the relations of races to each other; and of what is really of far more consequence than the ethnological aspect, the effect of antedating conditions of climate, government, labor, ethics, and social life; in fact, of differing civilizations and circumstances. This is the primal fact to be considered in the matter of Chinese emigration and settlement, whether on the Pacific coast or elsewhere. There is also another and very important series of questions involved in the issue, which must be carefully considered. They are economic and self-protective in character—facts which every community is bound to regard in dealing with others.

On the question of race assimilation the best instincts of the American people are in antagonism to the theory that there is any danger to our national progress or ethnic quality by the free admission to our shores of all men, of whatever race or clime, who may come to us under fair circumstances of self-dependence, and with reasonable prospects of industrial and social well-doing. No student of modern history will or can ignore the marvelous influence that has been exercised on the political and social life of older countries and nationalities through the remarkable immigration movement which from 1820 to 1860, in especial, has almost landed the population of an empire upon our shores. Setting aside all considerations affecting personal fortunes, and looking only at emigration as one of the great historical and political forces known to our era, it must be conceded that it has probably been as potential in remoulding and reanimating the countries from whence the emigrants came as it has been, industrially regarded, in making the wilderness "bloom and blossom as the rose," aiding to transform the once primeval forests and trackless prairies into harvest-waving fields, smiling with plenty, and made fit for the abode of a many million-handed nationhood.

As a political force, the doctrines set forth and maintained so steadfastly by the American Republic—such only as could be born of a free and federative nationality cradled as was this Union—the doctrines of a freely chosen expatriation and nationality, have crowned us as a people with the greatest of honor, while exercising a marvelous influence on the diplomacy and jurisprudence of governments differing in spirit and form from our own. It must, therefore, be for no light reason that American statesmen can approach even to the outer verge of considering whether or not the time may not have arrived for us as a nation to call a halt in this direction. It is to this point, both initial and conclusive, that the question of Chinese emigration to our shores is rapidly drawing public attention. The right of self-preservation belongs to a nation as equally as it does to the individual. It must be exercised, however, only after the most complete deliberation and when all minor and precautionary steps have been duly taken. Long before we debate the great issue, whether we can or not as a people declare our inability to admit the Asiatic alien and emigrant to citizenship with correlative public and social associations, we must have made full examination of the characteristics and circumstances attendant on such an emigration as that now coming from China to our shores. We must learn all that is possible as to its extent—past, present, and probable. It is our duty to examine into the conditions which surround the Chinese in his own country as well as those by which he is environed in our own midst. A fair knowledge of his habits and associations, personal and collective, are of the greatest value in making up that judgment upon which alone legislative action should be based. Such are some of the necessary precedent conditions. Let us ascertain, then, if they have been or can be satisfied.

As to the number of Chinese residents in the United States? This is the first thing to be ascertained. The census of 1870 gave the following figures:

Pacific and Mining States and Territories.		South Carolina.	1
California.....	49,310	Texas.....	25
Oregon.....	3,330	Virginia.....	4

Total63,251

Since 1870, however, there can be no doubt but that there has been a rapid increase of this class of alien immigrants. The following statement of the number of Chinese arriving from 1850 to 1875 is taken from the reports of the Bureau of Statistics. Premising that in 1821 there were three Chinese immigrants, in 1831 eight, and that ten years later thirty-five more had arrived, making in all forty-six, the annexed table gives the total arriving for the decade first named, and then by calendar years thereafter up to and including December 31, 1875:

Number of Chinese emigrants landed at all United States ports.

These figures are confirmed by the testimony now being taken before a committee of the State Senate of California, engaged in the investigation of what is there called the "Chinese Question." The "Six Companies"—bodies of Chinese merchants, traders, etc., residents of San Francisco, who keep control over their countrymen—report the number now in the United States as follows:

Sam Yup Company.....	10,100
Yung Wo Company.....	10,200
King Chow Company.....	5,000
Wing Yung Company.....	75,000
Hop Wu Company.....	34,000
Yan Wo Company.....	43,300
	187,600

This total is doubtless arrived at by counting all the Chinese who have landed on the Pacific coast since the immigration fairly begun in 1853, and does not accurately represent those now resident either in the whole country or on the Pacific coast alone. The excess of 2,666 over the Six Companies' figures, as shown by the official reports, doubtless indicates the Chinese who have landed at other than Pacific coast ports during the quarter of a century embraced.

Taking the Chinese population of the census, 63,251, and adding thereto the emigration for the following five years, 70,510, and the population would have been December 31, 1875, 133,761. The usual estimate made in California is 150,000. The smaller total is probably more correct. The larger portion of this emigration is composed of males. The proportion may be seen by the following figures:

	Females.
1871	349
1873	889
1874	243

Total arriving in five years.....2,837

During the same years the number of Chinese male emigrants was over 64,000. The importation of women is of comparatively recent date, and in all probability there have not been over 3,500 Chinese females landed in the United States. Comment is almost needless. It is this disparity between the sexes that affords a considerable proportion, and a justification, too, of the hostility with which this emigrant population is regarded, not alone, now-a-days, by those of our own people the price of whose labor has been, and is likely to be, seriously affected by the cheapness for which the mass of Chinese work and live, but by all careful and prudent citizens who see the relations of cause and effect, and are justly alarmed at the herding and living together, in any one locality, State, or section, of a clanish people, alien in all their habits, taking no root in our midst, guarding sedulously, with the congenital capacity for such faith which comes of a forty-centuried stability of ideas and institutions, their own methods of living and believing; and certain, too, to have inherited a very large proportion of the strange and lecherous vices and peculiarities which all travel, observation, and study prove to be a terrible feature of old and closely-guarded civilizations, such only as have been nursed and preserved among Asiatic nations from almost prehistoric days.

Such, then, as to present numbers, are the relations of the Chinese population in the United States. A very small number are living in Massachusetts and New Jersey, chiefly, as to the former State, at North Adams, in the employ of a noted shoe manufacturer, and in the latter at a large laundry near New York city. There are also, both in Massachusetts and Connecticut, a number of Chinese pupils, sent by the Imperial Government to be educated in this country. A few of their countrymen live in the Empire City. It is stated by the police that they are numerous enough at this date to support a joss house, maintain an opium den, and indulge freely in gambling. There is a China in petto, known as Donaven's alley, in that city, but otherwise the few score Celestials there are industrious and inoffensive. They usually follow peddling cigars or similar employments, and preserve their pigtails, if nothing else, to indicate their origin. In nearly all of the larger American cities a few stray Chinese may be found, and within the past two years Chinese laundries have been established in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and probably elsewhere. But, as will be seen, the great bulk of the Chinese are residents of California. They are found all along the Pacific coast and throughout the mining States and Territories. These people, outside of California, are usually regarded as a useful laboring population. They are patient, persistent, observing, imitative. Their ambition is limited, but what they do is thoroughly done, and when they have free opportunity their capacity, as drudges at least, makes them more serviceable in that sense than a population more progressive, pushing, and ambitious would or could be. They continually illustrate in this respect the fabled race between the tortoise and the hare. No one has denied to the earlier Chinese emigration serviceable industrial qualifications, and it is because of these that the present conditions, which are bringing a much inferior and less desirable class, has been allowed to grow up heretofore unchecked and largely unnoticed.

That at the present time there are nearly or quite 130,000 Chinese resident in California alone will not be questioned. That about 30,000 of these are now herded together in the city of San Francisco is without doubt. That a considerable proportion of the balance are crowded into the larger towns of the State, and that a very small proportion of the whole number are employed either in mining, agricultural, or other outdoor labor is beyond dispute. That in this entire population there are not 200 families; in San Francisco itself, not over one-half that number; that the greater number of the Chinese women resident there and in the Chinese quarters of other California towns are in fact brought as slaves from China, and used in America as courtezans of the worst type. It is not denied that the Chinese emigrant comes, as a rule, as an alien, remains as such, and returns to his native country, at the earliest opportunity, preserving unbroken his inherited associations and national characteristics. The exceptions are such as tend only to p general rule. It will be observed that the major of the population under consideration migrated hither since the making a cation of the Burlingame treaty in 1868. The number of Chinese landing shores from 1868 to 1875, include 108,039. It will be noticed that the increase dates from 1867, and that it indicates that the migration had come, as it has since continued to organized business, from which large profits must be derived. The continued increase, which dates from the outset of the Burlingame embassy, gives some force to the demand made by Senator Sargent for the nullification of certain articles in the treaty it negotiated. These articles are as follows:

ARTICLE V. The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and the inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage and free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects respectively from the one country to the other, for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents. The high contracting parties therefore join in reprobating any other than an entirely voluntary emigration for these purposes. They consequently agree to pass laws making it a penal offense for a citizen of the United States or Chinese subjects to take Chinese subjects either to the United States or to any foreign country, or for a Chinese subject or citizen of the United States to take citizens of the United States to China or to any other foreign country, without their free and voluntary consent respectively.

ARTICLE VI. Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions, in respect to travel or residence, as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation; and, reciprocally, Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions, in respect to travel or residence, as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. But nothing herein contained shall be held to confer naturalization upon citizens of the United States in China, nor upon the subjects of China in the United States.

The California Senator proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate recommends to the President that he cause negotiations to be entered upon with the Chinese government to effect such change in the existing treaty between the United States and China as will lawfully permit the application of restrictions upon the great influx of Chinese subjects to this country.

This demand is based upon the following considerations, as set forth by the Senator in the elaborate speech with which the foregoing resolution was supported. The argument can be thus summarized:

1. The presence of the Chinese in large numbers is a cause of serious discontent to the greater portion of our permanent population.

2. That the Chinese are not an assimilative people and do not come as other aliens, to make homes in our midst, or make this the land of their adoption. That the Chinese are not inclined to Republican ideas. There is no liberal party among them at home, and they bring no political discontent as open way for our own principles to march into their minds. They are imperialists and aliens, inheriting their opinions; and such the very great body of them must and will remain to their death.

3. The Chinese population expels all others. That to rent dwellings to them is to insure that such buildings will never be re-occupied by others. That they are filthy in their habits and surroundings beyond description; that they herd together in such squalor and indulge in such habits as make their presence in any city a sanitary offense, if not a positive danger to the balance of the community. They constantly provoke danger from conflagrations, while their clanishness and language render them outside of, rather than under, any efficient police regulations or restrictions.

4. That their habits of living and capacity for organization are such that they can destroy all competition, and thus they not only drive out the higher-priced and home-grown labor of our own race and people, but they gradually monopolize the manufacture of all light trades, as shoe and cigar making, &c., compelling the smaller capitalists and employers to surrender participation therein. Their presence, in fact, is the first veritable presentation to us of a genuine proletariat population.

Mr. Sargent, in granting that these people are in large degree an industrious class, adds, with considerable force: "But their very industries are a source of injury to the community, in that they undersell other labor and work for prices on which no white man can support a family. * * * If the community is built up by such industry, it is not as a New England or Western village is built up. It is Foo Chow, and not Cedar Rapids; it is Donovan alley, and not Broadway; it is the hovel, and not the home; the joss-house, and not the church; it is not republican; it is not civilization. * * * Five stalwart German or Scandinavian emigrants with their families would be better for the real interests of New York than the whole Chinese population of Donovan alley." He adds, in speaking of Iowa as a State which well illustrates the growth of homogeneous ideas and life, that "much besides industry is needed to make a desirable community in this land."

5. That while the Chinese emigrant brings cheapness of labor as an inducement for his admission, he does not, and as a rule cannot, come to our shores as a voluntary emigrant, in the sense that the European does. The evidence of our consuls, merchants, missionaries, of the better class of the Chinese residents—in fact, all accessible proofs—go to incontestibly show that the great mass of the Chinese immigrants are coolies or peons, bound to service at exorbitant rates for a term of years. Such contracts are, of course, invalid under our laws. They are contrary to the regulations promulgated by the Chinese Government itself, but those who make them with the wretched laborers are able to enforce them. The families are left in debt bondage. The peon or coolie cannot speak our language. His only object is to get back to China to release those who are there left in pawn. Debt slavery is a recognized institution of the Empire, and it is by this fact, and the terribly wretched condition of the masses in and near the southern sea-ports of China, that the shrewd and unscrupulous Chinese dealers in the labor of their countrymen are able to successfully organize a traffic that is not only hideous in character, but illegal in both countries. The Chinese are the victims, and, as the Senator claims, we shall benefit, not injure, them by the exclusion he demands.

6. The coolie transportation business is often infamous in its inhumanity, and has been denounced by all persons having any knowledge. Our consul at Hong-Kong, Mr. Bailey, has, in very able dispatches, given startling facts to show its character. We are asking relief, then, says Mr. Sargent, "from a condition of things degrading to free labor while peopling the nation with slaves."

7. Another reason for the general exclusion demanded grows out of the conditions under which the coolie laborer reaches here. Being in debt for his passage, his family is held in China as security for repayment. Hence he does not come to stay, and brings with him neither home life or family associations. This condition of affairs has produced another and more terrible traffic—that of Chinese females for the purposes of prostitution. The results of this traffic are simply horrible. It degrades the youth of our Pacific towns, sows the vilest diseases broadcast. All attempts to break it up have been thwarted by the organized perjury and intimidation which, it is charged, is so marked a feature of the lower Chinese life. Gambling is also an organized business, and the better class of this people acknowledge themselves as helpless as the authorities of San Francisco are to break up the frightful business.

8. Senator Sargent arraigns a Chinese population, where numerous, as one dangerous to peace. They are divided into clans, which fight savagely whenever they meet. The causes of all brawls are unknown to us, and belong to their national life and superstitions. Street brawls, with loss of life by the use of deadly weapons, are a common occurrence. They are also virtually uncontrollable by our laws. It is difficult to convict them, as perjury is a usual thing. It is estimated that at least ten per cent. of this population in San Francisco live by gambling, prostitution, and thieving, and that ninety-nine per cent. are persistent violators of the city ordinances.

Such then, is a brief recapitulation of the objections urged against a resident Chinese population. The indictment is a serious one. Careful study of the evidence fairly justifies the complaint. Space forbids the presentation of a more elaborate bill of particulars, but it could be furnished. The better class of Chinese residents, and there are men of capacity and probity among them, as well as the missionaries and teachers who have labored with them for years, have all testified recently to the increase of the dangerous and lawless class among the later arrivals, as well also to the in general pauperized and dependent condition of the great mass.

The remedies proposed by Mr. Sargent and those he represents are of the sterner character. They seem purely repressive in spirit. The resolution offered by the Senator embodies nearly the whole of his proposal. Senator Edmunds suggested that the subject was one for stringent Federal legislation in the way of a general prevention of any pauper and criminal immigration—laws which shall reach to the prevention and prohibition of European as well as Asiatic outrages of such a character.

Mr. Sargent looks chiefly to positive prohibition, by striking out or nullifying, as far as the Chinese are concerned, the declarations by which the principles of a free choice of nationality to any and all people, are proclaimed to be a fundamental condition of republican government.* Mr. Edmunds' suggestion would conserve the principle, while seeking by stringent and precautionary legislation to prevent the formidable evils shown to exist in California, as a consequence of the unrestrained transportation to our Pacific shores of the debt-bound and poverty-stricken laborers of southern China. It will be long, it is to be hoped, before the American Congress will set itself seriously to consider the necessity of abandoning the principle embraced by the first clause in Article V. of the Burlingame Treaty. Mr. Sargent's remedy is fundamental; Mr. Edmunds' corrective and preventive. The issues are so far reaching that the heroic treatment cannot properly be in order until it is apparent beyond question that nothing less will reach and remove the evil.

At present, then, the subject divides itself into two parts. They are—how to correct the evils already existing, and next, how to prevent their being added to by continued and unrestrained accessions of a similar character. As is too often the case in governments liable to be suddenly influenced by popular feeling, the extreme view is the one most persistently urged upon legislators, State and Federal. Having failed in an attempt to restrain or rather exclude by State legislation which has recently been decided to be unconstitutional in character, California, as the community most seriously affected, finds no other way of meeting the grievance than that presented by Senator Sargent, or that embodied, it is to be regretted, in acts of violence such as have recently been witnessed. Perhaps it may be necessary to meet the direct issue as the Senator presents it, but most certainly for all that California itself, or even the city of San Francisco at least, must first effectually exhaust all the powers of self protection and regulation which they possess.

To the most superficial student of the subject it must soon become evident that Chinese laborers will not immigrate to our Pacific States or elsewhere, in any large numbers, unless they find already existing, or are allowed to create for themselves, after securing a domicile, the conditions under which they can live most congenially. As they earn at home but a miserable pittance at best, live on the poorest of food, are surrounded by the most wretched of sanitary conditions, never having been accustomed to other circumstances, it follows that left to themselves they will in other countries seek the paths which produce therein similar results. The great mass of them arrive here, not paupers merely, but debt slaves, whose families are held as hostages for their obligations; it follows, to their honor be it said, that the laborer is anxious to economize to the utmost in order to return to China. As the wages paid, however large to them on arrival, are actually very small, the emigrant must be able to live, it may be said, "dirt cheap," and he does it. Again the Chinese are the shrewdest of speculators and traders, when the opportunity offers. The emigrant, so entirely a stranger in a strange land, is wholly dependent upon his countrymen who are on the spot. The latter sub-rent and sub-sell to the uttermost, making more or less of the minute profits that arise. Now, it happens, that the indifference of the municipalities and the early cupidity of property-holders, in California towns, as San Francisco for instance, is most largely to blame for the growth and pestilential character of their Chinese quarters. Loud complaints are made of their condition. Senator Sargent presented graphic pictures of the over-crowding, the squalor, and the filth. But the city authorities and the community have the perfect right to prevent over-crowding. It is quite within the province of a municipality to forbid (and enforce its prohibition, too) the herding of a hundred persons in a space not large enough for fifteen, as is usually done in the buildings rented by and for Chinese tenants. It is quite within proper police and sanitary regulations to prevent the open streets from being made a common sewer, as is usually the case where the Chinese live. All these, and a score of other preventive and repressive regulations, are clearly within the legitimate powers of a municipality. So far as Mr. Sargent or others present the case it does not appear that there has really been any serious attempt to enforce any such ordinances. The Senator quotes the clerk of the city police court as stating that nearly all Chinese residents violate the city ordinances. The corollary to this is that the enforcement must have been very lax. But the chief point to consider is this, that unless the Chinese themselves were allowed the conditions of cheapness and wastiness under which alone it seems possible for them to thrive at present, there never would have been anything like the number now found on the coast, nor would they come in the future to anything like the extent now seen. Stringent police and sanitary regulations, properly and rigidly enforced, powers perfectly within the compass of local authority, must not only do very much to check the evils and vices now bred by this population, but have an almost immediate effect in scattering and lessening those already here, as well as in checking the arrival of others.

Again, it is within the power, as it must be part of its duty, for the State of California, as well as the cities of San Francisco, Sacramento, Los Angeles, and others, to root out or restrain the vicious establishments so bitterly complained of. They can at least be put under surveillance and made to pay such heavy licenses and taxes, if they are not altogether prohibited, as will effectually blot them out. It is easy to assert that it is not possible to prove their existence, the Chinese being so bound together, and so ready to perjure themselves, as to prevent the obtaining of proper evidence. That this is not true the testimony now being given before a legislative committee proves conclusively. No serious attempt has been made as yet to correct or repress these obnoxious facts or to destroy the conditions in which they thrive. It will be well, therefore, for California herself to take the steps indicated. It will be prudent for other States and Territories in which a Chinese population have appeared to take heed of their neighbors' omissions, and to remember that "an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure."

The authorities also owe it to themselves to see to it that every facility is afforded for the Chinese youth at least to acquire some portions of an English education. It is not possible, even were it desirable, to summarily or by any legal process or illegal violence expel those who are already in our midst. It may be that every effort can justly and properly be made to deter from coming in the future a population so undesirable, but equally so is the city, state, and nation bound to offer and enforce every fair opportunity for reasonable progress among those already here, as well as to protect them to the utmost from all unlawful violence, personal or collective. The anger should be directed at the conditions and not to the individual Chinese, themselves the victims of a many-centuried social and economic despotism, and guilty only of the crime, if such it be, of seeking to better their miserable fortunes.

As to the general remedies which may properly be applied by Congressional legislation as well as Executive action, the outlines are simple and readily stated.

It is well understood that the Chinese Government do not desire the migration of its subjects. It was only after long agitation and by outside pressure that it has been brought to accept the principle of voluntary allegiance. It is not denied by any one acquainted with the facts but that the Imperial Government has sincerely sought to break up the hideous coolie traffic which has been till recently carried on through the Portuguese colony of Macao, and by means of which Cuba and Peru have heretofore been supplied by such labor. To its honor, also, the Chinese Government are acknowledged to have promulgated and enforced restrictive regulations against involuntary emigration and the traffickers in debt-labor, so that the severe penalties imposed have driven the business from Chinese soil, and transferred it in fact to a colony of Great Britain—Hong Kong. These evidences of Chinese good faith argue well for such a revision of treaty stipulations as will tend to the rapid disintegration of the present traffic.

It may not be possible for us to reach the subject by any treaty provisions, but the real point should be to induce China itself to abolish the atrocious system of debt-slavery or peonage, whereby the families of migrating laborers are held in pledge for his return and the repayment of extortionate advances. Certainly it is in the power of the Imperial Government to put in operation the forces which shall look toward such a beneficent reform. It can be done effectually as regards the laborers who come across the Pacific. Many instances are known of such laborers being enslaved on returning to China, upon the claim, real or assumed, that their advances had not been repaid. It would be a superb and splendid act of humanity—one worthy of the most enlightened statesmanship—for this young Republic to urge upon that venerable Empire, while seeking to prevent present and prospective evils to itself, the abolition of so great a wrong as the system under discussion. Practically, too, this abolition is the most effective means of suppressing the worst of the evils inflicted on our Pacific coast by Chinese emigration. There are, without doubt, other and important details to be sought in such a revision as Mr. Sargent desires, the naming of which belongs to those most familiar with Chinese character and surroundings. It ought not to be a difficult task to frame such provisions, then, as will meet some of the more serious evils. But, after all, the trouble will not cease. As Messrs Low and Brooks, one an ex-Minister to China and the other the Japanese consul at San Francisco, stated before the California committee of investigation, the emigration now complained of is nominally made from a British port and under the regulations of that Power. The emigrants mostly come from the province of Canton, through the colony of Hong Kong, where they reside a month, as required by the colonial law, and are then sent to California, generally by way of Yokohama, on the Pacific mail steamships. The traffic as now managed is an evasion of the laws of all three countries—China, Great Britain, and the United States. It will be necessary, therefore, to enter into negotiations with Great Britain as well as China to accomplish our purpose. There should be no difficulty in this course. The conduct of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company in refusing to take Chinese passengers back to China unless they exhibit a certain pass must be inquired into. We must not allow an American corporation to be a party to this infamous traffic.

As a matter of precaution and economy, the consulate at Hong Kong ought to be well sustained. The present consul is a very efficient officer, and ought to be allowed all the force necessary in the way of interpreters, etc., so as to enable him to learn all that is possible of this "heathen Chinese" way of enslavement and transportation.

Besides these measures, the Congress of the United States should consider and pass at an early day some comprehensive measure, such as that presented by Senator Harvey, of Kansas, looking to the regulation of immigration, the prevention of pauper and criminal migration, and the due protection of the immigrants themselves. It is a duty that cannot be shirked or evaded any longer. The Supreme Court have decided that the framing and enforcing of such regulations belongs only to the Federal Government and the legislative department thereof. In truth, it would be the part of statesmanship to not only adopt wise laws on this subject, but to open negotiations at once with all the leading Powers, European and Asiatic, for the framing of an international code for the protection of passengers in transit, and for the proper punishment of crimes and offenses against them while on the high seas.

Mr. Sargent, in presenting his remedies, referred to a subject of great importance—that of naturalization. He urged that no judge can legally naturalize an alien until he is satisfied, reasonably at least, of his bona fide acceptance of republican institutions. This, though applied to the naturalization of Chinese aliens, applies also with equal force to the whole matter. It is one of the most germane of the questions at issue. As a part of the needed reform, naturalization should be effected only through the Federal and not the State courts and judges. The citizenship given is primarily national. The alien becomes an American, and not merely a Californian or Kentuckian. The latter qualification is an incidence of residence and not a necessary consequence of the citizenship he may have therein first assumed. There ought to be also a complete record preserved of all naturalizations, which should be accessible at the place of record, and by duplicates at the seat of government. American citizenship is the noblest of public attributes. It should not be lightly assumed, nor those applying be allowed to partake without due preparations. Once assumed, protection and duties must be made equally secure and sacred.

Such, then, are some of the questions in-involved in the problem of Chinese residence in these United States. On the one side stand principles not to be lightly disregarded—our need of labor; our time-honored welcome to all industry; our heretofore unviolated assurance of asylum and liberty to all coming to us in good faith. On the other side stands an ancient race, patient, persistent, with a vast power of pacific resistance as well as movement, embracing nearly one-third of the world's population, which shows such a capacity for organizing migration and industry as we have heretofore hardly deemed possible, and which may well appal us as to the immediate consequences when the greed of gain on both sides shall co-operate effectually with the extreme wretchedness and poverty of the masses on those Asiatic shores to move them en masse across the Pacific, and so overwhelm our Western States and Territories with a population now so utterly and entirely alien to all our habits, life, and civilization.

WHY A SECTIONAL SOUTH CANNOT BE TRUSTED.

In and out of Congress, on the forum and in the press, from the pulpit or by the pen of Democratic partisans or "Liberal" doctrinaires, there is a constant burden of complaint, accusing or deprecating, as the case may be, to the effect that the North—i. e., the Republican party—is constantly showing distrust of the South. Senators Gordon, Withers, Maxey, Cockrell, Ransom, and even as moderate a man as Key, of Tennessee, arraign their Northern associates in the Senate chamber as unjust accusers and assailants of a gallant people who have accepted the situation forced upon them in the utmost good faith. In the Senate, as they have not yet obtained control, the accusation is put in the form of complaint and criticism. In the other branch, however, Lamar, Tucker, Ben Hill, Vance, Singleton, et al., being the acknowledged leaders of a controlling majority, (temporarily so, at least,) do not stoop to deprecation, but assume the judicial and accusing attitude, and arraign not only the Republican party and the Administration it sustains, but in effect assails the defense of the Union it conducted, seeking thereby to destroy the historical value of the victory won by its efforts for unity and liberty.

There is the desperation of despair as well as the aggressiveness of courage in both the complaint and the assault. It is self-evident that there is a profound distrust of the South among the loyal masses. The shrewdest Democrats, ex-Confederate and Northern, alike see that the people are again "on guard." What has been preached as bringing perpetual peace now proves to be only an armed neutrality at the best.

It is well to see why this is so. At Lexington last year Gen. Bartlett pleaded for the Southern prodigal son. At Bunker Hill the Maryland and Virginia troops were cheered to the echo. A little incident occurred on that occasion which illustrates this theme. A small group stood looking on the line of march. It included persons of Southern birth and proclivities, several New England friends, and one well known in former days for anti-slavery service. As the Northern escort marched by the Southerners did not cheer, but when their own friends passed they saluted enthusiastically. So did all of the group but the ones specially referred to. He was taken to task, and asked why he refrained, to which he replied he waited to see his Southern friends cheer the Northern soldiers. The reply was a hasty one, but it expressed the feeling that rankles—"They were invaders; why should we?"

The incident is insignificant, perhaps, but it expresses a wide-spread feeling, and shows clearly, too, that the old South, the political South, that of slavery and rebellion, of ostracism and White Leagues, still holds its ingrained belief that they are a conquered people, and we are but the triumphant foreigners at best. The North has been slow to perceive all this; but at last it understands. Slow of anger and effort, it is equally as slow to move back again when its spirit has been once roused. Without personal anger, with the kindest wishes to that section and all its people—the old or the new South—THE NORTH, those States which recognize and maintain in its integrity the national will, have at last become rearoused to the issues of the hour and what they imply.

The old South, politically speaking, will seek, for this generation at least, to be governed by its traditions. They are all associated with slavery and its former dominance, and with the advocacy of the doctrines of State supremacy, and its correlative, secession. The mouths of its orators have so long been inflamed with fiery rhetoric, and the intellects of its lawyers are so thoroughly dessicated by the processes of its Past, that it is practically impossible for the representatives of either type, like Hill and Tucker, to refrain from exasperating rhetoric or the lucid presentation of mischievous theories.

It may be said that the Toombses, Hills, Tuckers, and Singletons no longer represent the South; that the Ku-Klux Klans, White Leagues, Louisiana massacres, and Mississippi election outrages are sporadic and not chronic, incidental and surface, and not of the spirit and the flesh also. We are told that it is not fair to judge the South by the utterance of these representative men; but what else is to be done when for the last ten years the Lamars, Gordons, Keys, one and all, have stood by in approving silence, if not actually assenting to the results achieved by these renewed efforts of firing the Southern heart? While they have not disapproved outrages, or at the best perhaps mildly censured them, the deprecating ex-Confederates who are typified by such names as those mentioned have given most material aid and comfort to the renewed spirit of sectionalism by pouring out in their own homes, on the floor of Congress, or before the Northern people themselves, (as witness Gordon and Lamar in the New Hampshire canvass in 1875,) the most unstinted assault of all Republican leaders or workers, whether Northern or Southern born, who have had the audacity to reside as American citizens in the former rebel States, and to seek therein to exercise their rights as such by endeavoring to organize a political party on the basis of their own convictions.

The renewal of the sectional spirit is made manifest in the manner of and methods used to accomplish the apparent unity of action, politically speaking, which is now seen in the Southern States. The Republican vote in the former rebel States cannot be less than one-half of the whole poll, (the colored voters number not less than 900,000, and form at least three-sevenths of the whole body,) and yet, under the processes adopted to control them, the Democracy now have three-fourths of the representation in the House, over one-half of that in the Senate, and have wrested the Government from the control of Republicans, in whole or in part, within States where they are clearly recognized as having a large majority of the voters.

Now, whatever may be the real truth as to the process adopted to secure this apparent unity of sentiment among the States, border and rebel, which were formerly slaveholding, the fact of its existence is evident. In its existence, also, lies the real danger to the Republic. The South long since determined to ruin where it could no longer rule. Hence the civil war, with all its mighty events and consequences. But, demoralized as the conscience and character of men and women became under the influences of slavery, this dreadful step would not have been taken but for another fact.

The specious doctrine of State sovereignty—local liberty to do wrong—was the one which held the mass of the Southern whites to the service of their daring and reckless leaders. Adherence to these views have been, in their eyes, sanctified by the losses of the civil war and the defeat they suffered. It is made the means of again consolidating a sectional spirit; of once more reuniting the Southern States under old cries for old issues and by an old policy. Every editorial writer, every pulpit declaimer, every orator, old or young, who airs his voice on public occasions, takes for his text the "lost cause," and for the burden of his plea the necessity of preserving its principles and defending its associations. What were its principles? On one side the necessity of organizing legal, civil, social, industrial inequality into government and its administration; and on the other the supremacy of the parts over the whole, of the States over the Federation, of the limbs over the body, of the rights of provincialism over nationality. No one has interfered with principle or right, except that of revolting from the Union without righteous cause or the holding of human beings in bondage. It is true that secession has been destroyed, civil war defeated, and the South as a whole made richer by freedom, personal and institutional. A sectional unity, therefore, which is fomented by constant appeals of this character, is one fraught only with evil to the Republic. A sectional policy is always to be deplored, and doubly so when its aim is political control by means of a solid section dominating the councils of a national party, so called. This is the old, old story of our politics. We fear the Greeks even when they come with presents. So said the wise Trojans, according to blind Homer's report. Are we not justified in fearing a Democracy controlled chiefly by the reunited South, even though it comes with presents in the specious form of good wishes for unity and reconciliation?

DEMOCRATIC COURTESY.

These are stirring times, and, as was recently remarked, times in which the whole force and ability of the Democrats of the National House of Representatives are engaged in throwing sturs at their Republican colleagues and denouncing the corruption of Republican officials without giving those officials an opportunity to be heard. Mr. John L. Vance is chairman of the Congressional committee which investigated the office of Mr. A. M. Clapp, the Public Printer. The Democratic members of the committee proceeded on their work, not in the spirit of inquiry to ascertain facts, but with a pre-determination to give the worst interpretation to everything brought to their notice, and with little regard to the explanation which Mr. Clapp might have been able to afford. The Democratic portion of the committee seemed to have organized themselves into a court to convict at all hazards, and to have purposely kept the Public Printer away from them, though his official affairs were being investigated.

The Congressional Record of May 13, 1876, contains the report of the committee. It is interspersed with occasional correspondence, from which the spirit of the committee may be seen. So partisan, so unfair, so discourteous a committee has rarely placed before the people the evidence of its own discourtesy and unfairness; and if Mr. Vance's committee is a sample of other Democratic committees, the reports of investigations can only be considered as partisan documents, published with the intention of injuring Republicans, but having no relation to truth or to good morals. Indeed, if the object of Democratic investigations is not to arrive at the truth, but to assail and smirch Republicans, the country ought to be aware of the profligate waste of time they in the shameless expenditures which have to pay.

The amenities of life have been recognized even among political. Between gentlemen the rule ought always to prevail; but positive, gratuitous discourtesy may be the character of the re-investigation presented, is too to be allowed to pass without remark. Will the people think of the fol-appear the most effectual to answer that most important purpose, and to agree upon proper measures for securing the same."

At this point it will be worth while to note how the first Continental Congress was chosen. The Virginia House of Burgesses, meeting on the 26th of May, 1774, the day after the Royal Governor had formally dissolved it, authorized the opening of a correspondence with the other Colonies. Massachusetts elected her delegates first—June 17—through its House of Representatives. Twelve Colonies responded. Six of them elected their delegates by direct local action of the voters, or through committees chosen for the purpose. These were, Maryland, June 22, by county committees; New Hampshire, July 21, in a general meeting convened by the towns; New Jersey, July 23, by county committees appointed for the purpose; New York, July 27, by popular elections in seven wards of the city and in Suffolk and Kings counties, (the city delegates were confirmed by county committees selected for the purpose;) Virginia, August 1, in a general meeting of delegates elected by the several counties; and North Carolina, August 15, in a general meeting of deputies or delegates chosen by the inhabitants of the Colony. These events all occurred in 1774.

In the other Colonies, Massachusetts chose her delegates through the Colonial House of Representatives, June 17; Connecticut, July 13, by a committee authorized to do so by legislative enactment; Pennsylvania, July 22, by the General Assembly; as did Rhode Island also, August 10. In Delaware the representatives of the freemen convened August 1, by circular letters from the Speaker of the Colonial House, and selected the delegates. This was not done in a legislative capacity. The House of Commons in South Carolina, August 2, 1774, selected its delegates.

This was not only the first direct step toward an American Union, but toward the organization of the Colonies therein represented into States. The Provincial Congresses that were quickly formed grew almost entirely from the advisory action of the Continental body, just as it will be seen did the subsequent transformation of revolting Colonies, into "independent" States. The Second Congress was formed of delegates elected in most cases by the provincial bodies, but in a few instances by the Colonial Assemblies, at least where they still existed.

As to the creation of the several State governments themselves, facts even more conclusive than those already given prove that not only the Confederation was the result of a general movement, naturally manifesting itself by the aid of the local forms that were then in existence, but that the several States, recognized as such first and formally in the Articles of Confederation, received their direction and controlling force from the congresses that embodied and directed affairs in the initiatory revolutionary period from 1774 to 1781, when the complete ratification of the Articles of Confederation closed the career of the Second Continental Congress. A brief chronological and historical statement will prove this position.

Early in 1776 the Connecticut General Assembly declared by act that "the ancient form of civil government contained in the charter * * * shall be and remain the civil Constitution of this State, under the sole authority of the people thereof, independent of any king or prince whatever. And that this Republic is, and shall forever be and remain, a free, sovereign, and independent State, by the name of the State of Connecticut."

This action, with that of Rhode Island, the Colonial Assembly of which, by act of May, 1776, declared the charter to be the fundamental law of the Commonwealth then created, seems to have been the first and only direct and independent action toward State organization on record. Connecticut is entitled to the honor of first using the word "State" and of first assuming the functions it implies.

Prior thereto, however, the first Continental Congress had passed several resolutions, at the request of delegates, recommending different Colonies to form such governments as would in the circumstances be most conducive to their welfare. New Hampshire and South Carolina were the first to ask the advice of the Continental Congress and to act thereon. This fact takes away something of the force that belongs, at first glance, to the action of Connecticut and Rhode Island, as it shows there was a general acceptance of the Continental Congress, as the body empowered by its character to initiate the movements needed for the establishment of provisional governments.

On the 3d of November, 1775, the First Continental Congress passed a resolution in response to the appeals of the New Hampshire delegates for the advice their people had instructed them to ask, by which the Provincial Congress thereof was urged to "establish such a form of government as in their judgment will best produce the happiness of the people." The convention which framed a temporary form of government met December 21, 1775, and their plan was agreed to and promulgated in January following. A formal constitution was framed and rejected in 1778-'9, and a second one being framed was adopted October 31, 1783. In South Carolina the movement began November 1, 1775. The Continental Congress passed a resolve, November 4, at request of the delegates, approving of any action necessary for the temporary establishment of a State government. The term used up to this date and afterward was "Province," and not "State." The temporary form went into operation March 26, 1776. The first regular State constitution became operative in 1790.

North Carolina comes next in date, as she was almost first in efforts at direct and separate action. The Provincial Congress, one of the bodies which grew out of the policy of the First Continental Congress, in April, 1776, ordered the preparation of a State constitution, which was framed and became operative, December 18, of the same year. North Carolina, like Connecticut or Rhode Island, does not appear to have waited on the passage of advisory resolutions by the General Congress. Its patriots, however, well knew they were following in the recognized line of policy.

Georgia also framed a temporary form of government simultaneously with North Carolina. April 15, 1776, its second Provincial Congress framed and made operative such a form, subject, it declared, to the "further order of Congress"—referring in the first place to the general body and next and explicitly to itself or any subsequent Provincial Congress. The first regular State constitution was framed and became operative February 5, 1777.

Massachusetts, as became her activity in resistance, was earliest in definite separation from the crown. Acting under the advice of the Continental Congress, July 19, 1775, a House of Assembly was elected, which on meeting acknowledged the Colonial charter as the constitution of the Province. On the 1st of May, 1776, it enacted that the royal authority should be no longer recognized in any form, and adopted the name and style of "The People and Government of Massachusetts." It was not until June 16, 1780, that the people accepted and ratified the second regular State constitution submitted to them. The first had been rejected.

The Colony of Virginia moved early and steadily to its goal. With Massachusetts it was a leader. The Bay State was first on the Northern line; Virginia first on the Southern. On the 6th day of May, 1776, the delegates of the people took their earliest steps toward the framing of a constitution, which was completed and subsequently adopted and made operative June 12th and 29th of the same year.

The Second Continental Congress acted upon and adopted the following, May 10-15, 1776, and all subsequent action toward organizing State governments was taken thereunder:

"Resolved, That it be recommended to the respective assemblies and conventions of the United Colonies, where no government sufficient to the exigencies of their affairs hath been hitherto established, to adopt such government as shall, in the opinion of the representatives of the people, best conduce to the happiness and safety of their constituents in particular, and America in general."

The spirit in which this action was received, and the still more glorious one by which the Declaration of Independence was adopted, is seen in the following extract from resolutions passed at White Plains,

July 9, 1776, by the Provincial Convention of New York:

"Resolved unanimously, That the reasons assigned by the Continental Congress for declaring the United Colonies free and independent States are cogent and conclusive."

The noticeable fact in this and similar action taken in the remaining Colonies is the unequivocal recognition of the right and of the Continental Congress—that is, the body delegated by the whole people to act in their behalf—to declare the "United Colonies free and independent States." Is there any natural or logical process, then, whereby the limbs become the body; the parts the whole; the created the creator? To return, however, to the dates of State action.

The remaining five States took prompt action. New Jersey almost anticipated the resolution already quoted and began the formation of her first State constitution very soon after the Continental Congress took its first formal step toward separation. A new Provincial Congress was convened by authority of the resolution already quoted, and on the 10th of June it resolved to concur in a Declaration of Independence and to make a "confederacy for a union and common defense." On the 26th the draft of a constitution was submitted, and on the 2d of July, confirmed. It was made public and put in force on the 3d of July, 1776.

Delaware decided on the 14th of June, 1776, through her General Assembly, to act under the resolution of May 10. A convention soon met and adopted the first State constitution, September 21, 1776.

In Maryland action ran in a similar form, and the Provincial Congress or Committee of Safety called a convention to frame a State government, August 24. It met and completed its labor. The constitution so framed was adopted November 8, 1776.

Pennsylvania patriots acted independently of the Proprietary or Colonial Assembly, which sought in part to perpetuate its authority, after action looking to independence had been set in motion. It met for the last time without a quorum, September 26, 1776. On the 18th of June preceding, however, a conference of leading public men was held, by whom a Provincial Convention was called. That body met July 15, 1776, and framed a constitution which became the organic law of that State, September 28, of the same year.

New York took as early action as her circumstances allowed, by voting on the 9th of July, 1776, in the White Plains Assembly, that the Province would support the Declaration of American Independence with all the means at its command. On the next day the style of the Assembly was formally changed from that of Provincial Congress of the Colony to that of "the State of New York." The first regular constitution was adopted April 20, 1777.

Such in brief outlines are the principal facts in relation to the governmental organization of the original States of the American Union. What is there in a single one herein presented which justifies the assumptions of the Calhoun-Beverly Tucker school? Everything points conclusively to the deduction that the American Republic through its chief stages as United Colonies, Confederacy, and Union, was born of the people's will—out of their desire to form a separate and sentient nationality; and that in fact, the States, as now understood, were in reality the creatures of that remarkable effort rather than its molders and fashioners. The dividing lines of the several Colonies and provincial settlements were used as frameworks on which the collective body or Continental Congress induced the people therein resident to build such governments as would most assuredly promote their welfare. The States, as such, were the children of the United Colonies; the latter was not the foundling brought to lusty growth by the independent action of any of the parts. The national character of the Revolutionary period cannot be more forcibly illustrated than by the constant appeals to the "United Colonies," as such, or by the marked obedience shown by each to all the earlier unifying and directing impulses it gave out. There would have been no States if the United Colonies had not first asserted themselves; the States, practically, logically, and legally, derived their existence from the action taken at different times in the two Continental Congresses, finally culminating in the adoption of the Declaration of Independence.

THE TRUTH OF HISTORY AND THE HORRORS OF ANDERSONVILLE.

THE REPUBLIC has received in response to the appeal it made sometime since a large number of communications, all of them authenticated by the writers' full names and addresses, as well as by the commands to which they were attached during the war, or at the time of their capture. They all tell the same invariable tale of personal cruelty, of a brutal policy, unnecessarily harsh regulations, and of a vindictive spirit of neglect and ill-will. So general is this that the publication of the hundreds of communications now in possession of THE REPUBLIC would constitute the most fearful indictment possible against the rebel authorities. There is scarcely a gleam of light through the whole of these somber narratives. In fact, it would seem as if it had been the policy of the Confederate leaders to bring out all the brutes which that "sum of all villainies"—slavery—could produce, and place them in control of our unfortunate prisoners. The "Southern Historical Society" has recently made a labored defense of the Confederate Government against the crushing arraignment that was provoked from Mr. Blaine and others by the folly of those who wanted to honor Jefferson Davis. After occupying about three hundred pages with a great deal of irrelevant and unauthenticated matter, it sums up by claiming to have established:

1. That the laws, orders, regulations, etc., of the Confederate Congress, army, and administration made all possible provisions for the fair treatment of prisoners of war.

2. That if these were sometimes violated, it was without consent or knowledge of that government, and that prompt action was always taken to correct abuses.

3. That failure of prisoners to get full or proper rations was due to the destructive warfare carried on by the Federal troops.

4. That the mortality in Northern prisons was three per cent. more than in Southern prisons, and that the suffering in the latter was produced by causes beyond control, such as epidemics, want of medicines, owing to the Federal blockade, our "inhuman" refusal to make exchanges, etc.

5. That Northern prisons were managed with horrible brutality. Prisoners were starved, frozen, suffered from want of medicines, hospital stores, and attendance, were shot at and beaten on slightest pretext, that friends were refused permission to provide for them, etc.

6. That our policy of non-exchange was responsible for the larger part of the suffering that prevailed.

This is a fair abstract of what it is claimed has been proven by the "Southern Historical Society."

The evidence presented to support these assertions consists in the main of the following documents, etc.:

New Orleans letter of Jefferson Davis, January 27, 1876, addressed to James Lyons, of Virginia.

Testimony of Robert E. Lee before the Committee on Reconstruction in 1866, and a private letter bearing date April 17, 1867, addressed to a cousin, Dr. Charles Carter, of Philadelphia, both denying in general terms charges of cruelty against prisoners.

An extract from A. H. Stephens' book, "War Between the States," endeavoring to show that the responsibility rested upon the Federal authorities.

A letter from Robert Ould, commissioner of exchanges; first published in the National Intelligencer, August, 1868.

An important document in the shape of a report by a joint committee of the Confederate Congress, March 3, 1865, by which in general terms a reply is attempted to the charges made in the Union States, growing out of the horrible condition in which our soldiers were being returned from Southern prisons. An attempt is also made to establish cruelty in Northern prisons.

Then follow a variety of papers: Cartels between belligerents; reports of medical officers, Drs. Jones and Stevenson being especially relied upon; a statement of General Imboden, C. S. A., who was, under Winder, in general charge of the Andersonville and Eufala (Ala.) prison pens. This paper does not deny great suffering, but endeavors to show it was not avoidable, and in reality due to the want of exchange.

Colonel Chandler's report of his inspection of the Georgia pen is printed with a denial of Mr. Davis' knowledge thereof. It is declared that he never heard of it until 1875. A long letter from the chief clerk of the Confederate War Department deals in a series of general denials, but is especially interesting as to the Chandler report; also letters of Jefferson Davis and Mr. Seddon, rebel Secretary of War, defending Winder as "a gallant soldier and honorable gentleman." The Confederate Adjutant General, Cooper, indorses this eulogy.

General Beauregard defends the right to plant torpedoes in a road about to be marched over by an enemy, and denounces General Sherman's employment of rebel prisoners to remove those he found planted near Fort McAllister, Savannah, Georgia.

These are the papers, etc., mainly relied upon to prove how humanely the Confederate authorities acted toward prisoners of war. There are, in addition to what have been named, a recent editorial by Charles A. Dana, and some half dozen brief extracts, presenting a slightly more favorable view than usual, taken from the hundreds of witnesses whose testimony of a wholly different character is given in the Congressional report of 1868-'69.

Under the head of "Federal Treatment of Confederate Prisoners," the Southern Historical Society groups a mass of statements, largely irresponsible. The first comes in the person of Henry Clay Dean, a notoriously foul and unclean demagogue, of the most virulent Copperhead stripe, whose statement is a mass of loose falsehoods published in book form under the title of "Crimes of the Civil War." On any political topic, or on any subject connected with the war, Dean's statements would not be received under oath. He is an unscrupulous and disreputable demagogue, utterly without credit, except in the lowest circles of the "Sons of Liberty," among Missouri guerillas, and the readers of "Pomeroy's Democrat."

Letters, extracts, and narratives are given from the pens of Rev. G. W. Nelson, rector of the Episcopal Church, Lexington, Virginia, who was a rebel soldier; from an unnamed rebel officer to an unnamed lady in Massachusetts; extracts from a book written by A. M. Kelley, Mayor of Richmond, Virginia, who was a prisoner of war at Elmira; and papers from Rev. Dr. Handy, a Virginian clergyman confined at Fort Delaware; also from the Rev. George Harris; from T. D. Henry, Oak Grove, Kentucky, written in 1866 and sworn to in California 1876, captured with Morgan in Ohio; and Major R. Stiles, prisoner at Johnson's Island and Fort Lafayette. One Charles Wright, of Tennessee, gives an account, or what pretends to be, of prison life at Rock Island. In it he charges a dead-line, wanton shooting thereat, and robbery of rations. There is also a statement of a Union soldier, named John A. Bateson, who is ready to swear, he says, that prisoners were starved to death. One John J. Van Allen, of Watkins, Schuyler county, New York, states that he was refused permission at Elmira to distribute relief funds, etc., intrusted to him by kindly persons in Baltimore. The anonymous letter from a so-called medical officer, published in the New York World, and relating to the Elmira prison is reproduced, in spite of the riddling it received on the floor of the House of Representatives during the memorable Blaine-Hill-Garfield debate.

This constitutes nearly all the testimony produced to make out the charge of wanton inhumanity in Northern prisons.

The balance of the Southern Historical Society's paper is taken up with an attempt to prove that the refusal to exchange, so called, was in violation of the laws of war, with which argument there is little in common with the horrors of the rebel prison pens.

The case as made for the South, by the Historical Society thereof, does not better the facts or disprove the allegations, which are, alas, too well proven. No one has denied that the documentary facts were made all right for historical purposes. Doubtless the Confederate Congress had an eye to scenic effect, though it betrayed itself occasionally, as in the no-quarter resolutions offered by Mr. Hill, and in the brutal proclamation of Jefferson Davis in relation to colored soldiers and their officers.

As to the character of Winder and his subordinates, they were long since proven to have been infamous. Defense of their acts only proves the charges of sympathy with them that have been and are now made. On the question of relative mortality, it is to be distinctly remembered that the Confederate prisoners of 1863-'64 were generally when captured in a debilitated condition, unfit for duty, and liable to fall victims to any epidemic that might break out. The rapid increase of deaths at Elmira at one time was due to the prevalence of small-pox, not altogether preventible, and likely to be brought there by the prisoners themselves. Take the death-roll of Andersonville, however, and it will be seen that at least ninety per cent. of the deaths arose from causes altogether preventible, and largely due to malarious ground, damp and crowded, insufficient food, and poorly cooked. Also, to the utter want of shelter. The principal diseases given in Dorrence Atwater's Death-Roll are scorbutus, diarrhoea, dysentery, and typhoid fever. These diseases carried off at least eleven thousand of the nearly thirteen thousand who died in that pandemonium. Does not this fact show clearly what were the causes of the shocking mortality? The annexed narrative will do it, at least.

As to the insufficiency of food being caused by the warfare carried on by the Union forces, a complete answer is found in the fact as to Andersonville, that during the period of greatest suffering therein, 1864, the State of Georgia was able not only to feed its own forces, but a large number of other Confederate troops, while Sherman's army of 60,000 men entirely subsisted on the region through which it marched. Over 12,000 men died in the Andersonville Pen during 1864. They were half starved, yet over one hundred thousand soldiers subsisted in the same region. So with the other prisoners. Our cavalry and other commanders raiding and living on the country were generally able to keep their men in good condition. The prisoners were, however, as ill-fed before as after such raids.

Now, as to the charges of ill-treatment in Northern prisons, the evidence is altogether too meagre to be worth considering. When there is any serious presentation of such charges it will be time enough to reply in a serious manner.

If the Confederate South has nothing better to show than the paltry presentation made by the Southern Historical Society it will find that the only result is labor for their pains. Read the following—only one among hundreds of similar statements in possession of THE REPUBLIC. There is no special pleading in its direct, straightforward narrative:

To the Editor of the Republic:

In reply to your invitation to all survivors of Andersonville prison to send to your office statements of their experiences in that pen of horrors I submit the following sketch, which may be of interest to your readers. I will not, however, attempt to describe in full what I saw and experienced, for volumes could be written on the subject and the half not be told. Description is almost defied. I was taken prisoner at the battle of Chickamauga, and after a confinement of eight months at Richmond and Danville, Va., was taken to Andersonville prison. This notorious place contained twenty-seven acres of ground inclosed by a stockade twenty feet high. A narrow railing built within eighteen feet of the stockade marked what was known as "the dead line." Any prisoner coming near this line ran the risk of being shot on the spot, the instructions to the sentinels being very strict on this point. Several poor fellows who had ventured too near the line were shot on this account to serve as examples to the rest. Upon this ground, which but a few months before formed part of a dense forest, not one single tree had been left for shelter or shade. Was it not the spirit of barbarous cruelty and revenge that prompted the rebel authorities to cut down every tree and leave the prisoners entirely unprotected? Ingenuity was taxed in every conceivable way to provide some kind of shelter, burrowing being generally adopted as the only means of escape from the burning rays of the midday sun. Living as it were in the earth, and having no sanitary facilities, no change of clothing, vermin bred and thrived, requiring a daily clothing hunt to relieve the body of their pestiferous attacks.

Imagine 30,000 human beings confined the same as so many wild beasts turned out into a field, without the least shelter, exposed to all kinds of weather, and kept on a very small allowance of coarse corn bread and pork, with no change in the diet. As a natural result of such inhuman treatment diseases of the worst nature followed, particularly the scurvy, which manifested itself in all its hideous forms. The blood had become so impure that wounds would not heal, and consequently were followed by gangrene or mortification, the sufferers finding relief only in death, a few being saved through amputation. Vaccination was the primary cause in most of these cases. Many of the prisoners had been confined at Danville, Virginia, where the small-pox prevailed to an alarming extent during the winter of 1863-'64. Fortunately I escaped with an attack of varioloid, and my vaccination was healed before my removal to Andersonville. The so-called hospital was not much of an improvement upon the prison, the only shelter there offered being old tents, with nothing but the bare ground to serve for a bed. Medicines were furnished in very limited quantities, and of the many treated only a few recovered.

Passing myself off as a sick man one day, having previously obtained a rebel cap and jacket, I was admitted to the yard in front of the main prison gate inclosed by an ordinary board fence, wherein the sick were examined every morning for admission to the hospital. Watching for some time my opportunity I eluded for a moment the vigilance of the sentinels, and climbing over the fence walked away leisurely and effected my escape. In my eagerness to escape I had hardly realized the great risk assumed, but having become desperate was prepared to attempt almost anything for the sake of liberty and escape from this den of horrors. Concealing myself for the day in a ravine near by I started for the Union lines as soon as it was dark enough for safety. On reaching Flint river we (I say we, for in my travels I had fortunately met an escaped prisoner) discovered a small boat, in which we concluded to go down the river to the Gulf, and so reach our gunboats. But alas for human hopes and aspirations! We moved on swimmingly with the swift current, watching closely the snags; but toward morning, being off guard a little through drowsiness that had stolen over us, we struck a snag, which upset our boat, throwing us into the stream near the edge of a large swamp. Here we struggled for about four hours trying to get out (the water being about five feet deep) until our cries for help brought a darky to our rescue, who assisted us out and ministered very kindly to our comforts. Bless the darkies; I had occasion to try their faithfulness in several trying emergencies while endeavoring to effect my escape, and always found them true as steel.

I had become so exhausted by the struggle for life in the swamp that I was unable to continue my flight, and therefore requested my colored friend to conduct me back to prison on his horse, as he did not dare to harbor me longer. My companion, who had been a prisoner only a short time, continued his flight. On my return I was placed in the prison hospital at Andersonville, where I lingered a long time between life and death, but finally recovering again effected my escape with another prisoner. Our liberty, however, was of short duration. We had been out only one night, and had just concealed ourselves for the day some distance from the main road, when we heard the dismal howl of the bloodhounds on our track. Quick as thought we climbed a tree which fortunately happened to be near us, and awaiting their arrival were soon surrounded by a pack of twelve hounds, clamorous to get hold of us. Upon arrival of the men in charge, who pretended to be looking for runaway negroes, we were released from our position and conducted back to prison. I have related this little chapter of my prison experience to prove how our prisoners were treated. Wirz kept these hounds for the express purpose of recapturing escaped prisoners, and every morning the dogs were taken around the stockade to be put on the track. Shot down, hounded down, exposed and starved to death was only a part of the cruel treatment to which we were subjected. Other cruelties were perpetrated upon us, but I cannot enter into heart-sickening details. No wonder the poor fellows died off at the rate of over 100 per day, and one day in August, I remember, the death-roll numbered nearly 150. The dead were thrown into carts and dumped promiscuously into pits for burial like so many dead animals. In the foregoing I have merely given the outlines; details are not given, for space and time forbid. And if in the face of these facts Mr. Hill, of Georgia, had the effrontery to say in the halls of Congress, "I have also proved that, with all the horrors which you have made such a noise about as occurring at Andersonville, greater horrors occurred at prisons where you held our prisoners, and that the atrocities of Andersonville do not begin to compare with the atrocities of Elmira, Fort Douglas, or Delaware." What an insult to offer to our loyal dead prisoners and their survivors! Did not the rebel prisoners confined in these Northern prisons have good shelter and food, and were they not treated as well as they could be under the rules and regulations of civilized warfare? Away with such a perversion of the truth! Well may Mr. Hill say, "let us turn our backs on the past," for it has a most damnable record against the late so-called Confederate Government, which would permit the existence of the Andersonville den of horrors—a lasting disgrace to the civilization of the nineteenth century.

PATRIOTISM AND SLANDERS.

"The feast of reason and the flow of soul" has at all times been a source of enjoyment to men of thought, and to men who felt that there were necessarily duties to be performed between man and man. Especially was the performance of political duties recognized, inasmuch as the peace and progress of society were closely interwoven with it. A spirit of patriotism often produced a spirit of emulation; and a citizen would mark out for himself a line of employment which had for its object the protection of liberty, the support of those principles which would enhance the value of free institutions, and their practical application to public and private affairs, in order that the country might have the advantage of the aid and intelligence of the best citizens, and an influence always in active operation, pressing directly to popular advancement.

This long has been and is the attitude of Republicans. If ever a political party had grown out of the necessity of the times it is the Republican party. Its principles called for the co-operation of all who loved the heritage of the fathers; and when the peril of the Nation was caused by the disloyalty of the leaders of the Democracy who drew aside expecting the Union to be destroyed, the patriotism of Republicans impelled them to interpose themselves as a living bulwark between Democratic rebellion and the preservation of the Republic. The Union was saved, but hundreds of thousands offered their lives as a sacrifice on the battle-field, and their efforts live in the grateful memory of the people.

The Union was saved by the Republican party from destruction. What the Democratic party was before the war, and during the war, every one knows; and it is very busy in making history now. In the first place, it has no sympathy with the work which Republicans have done, and in the next place, the Democratic leaders are trying to hound down all the statesmen who sustained that work and so undo their legislation. In a word, the Bourbon Democracy have planted their feet upon the great Rock of Scandal, and mean, if they can accomplish it, the destruction of the most prominent Republicans, whose only fault is that they have been faithful and labored most diligently for the welfare of the Union.

The Democratic party has inaugurated a reign of scandal. A hundred years ago Washington and the purest patriots of his day were assailed with the most virulent scandal. Reckless charges were scattered through the land, and our fathers were asked to believe them. Did the scandal-mongers of the early years of Independence succeed? No! The people could not credit that men who had been instrumental in founding a new Nation should have been unfaithful to it. The charges were monstrous; but there was no suspension of judgment. Citizens of every State supported the patriots against whom the scandal was aimed in the most practical way. If they took the trouble to deny it, they acted as if no scandal existed; or if the scandal had any effect at all, it bound them together in a firmer resolution to do their duty, their whole duty as citizens, and cast their ballots with irresistible force against defamation. Shall the present reign of scandal and defamation triumph? The founders of the Republic came through the scandal ordeal without the smell of fire upon their garments,

The Democracy have now arraigned the Republican party for what it has done. The Republican party saved the Republic which the Democracy would have destroyed. Can Democratic scandal hurt it? Prominent Republicans participated in the preservation of the Union, in the reconstruction of the South, and in seeking to render citizenship there as valuable and safe as it is in the North. Shall Democratic scandal hurt them for that? All the floodgates of scandal are opened by the Democratic leaders in the committee rooms of the Capitol. For the preservation of the Capitol, too, the Democratic party has to thank Republicans; for the Southern rebels meant to have marched on Washington, burned the Capitol and public buildings, and sacked the city. Who prevented them? Loyal soldiers who had the patriotism to fight for their country and since then the right to vote as they fought, while the Democracy were mainly allied with its enemies. It does seem strange that the well tried patriotism and courage which saved the city of Washington and the Union should have preserved the Capitol as an asylum for the country's enemies, and that the first use of the amnesty which admitted them to the National Legislature should be to dominate and subdue their Northern sympathizers, and then combine and turn upon those who were carrying out a national policy, seeking to break them down by scandalous attacks and venomous charges.

Men who have done so much for their country that history teems with their services are hardly the men to do it an injury. And it stands to reason that those who saved the Union, and raised it till it now stands foremost among the nations of the earth, are not of the party to furnish men to dwarf its fair proportions; to halt on the road of progress; to favor extravagance in expenditures; or to mislead the people into attacking or taking away the rights of others.

As the founders of the Republic rode through the scandal of their day unharmed, so will the preservers of the Republic be unharmed by the Democratic scandal of to-day. But scandal becomes the Democracy, whose history is scandalous, and what is worse, deserved. The Democracy has waited for ten years to do just what they are doing. Scandal is their natural occupation. Will not the people, observing the confusion, the untruthfulness and the costly delay of the Confederate House of Representatives in its endeavors to smirch the character of better men, step in and prevent a repetition of the disaster, and say such Democratic occupation is gone? Let Republicans go to the polls, under all circumstances, and cast their ballots as they fired their bullets. Surely, then, the Democratic occupation of slandering Union leaders will be gone indeed under Republican sway, the country will be led into the way of restoration wherein the rights of citizens shall be respected and upheld, while all reforms that are needed may be inaugurated by those who preserved a government to be revered for its principles, and the Republic to be honored in its integrity.

THE AMNESTY DEBATE AND MR. HILL.

[From the Washington Chronicle, June 4.]

Representative Benjamin H. Hill, of Georgia, expresses anger at the republication (in part) of his speech made during the amnesty debate. The expression of anger towards everything he is not in sympathy with is a peculiarity of Mr. Hill's character. That, and ability to adroitly change a position, are among his leading traits. It is very difficult for the Georgian "fire-eater" to express himself otherwise than in uncivil terms, while the measure of his own conceit is so huge that it blunts by its bulk alike the sense of truth and logic. This is well illustrated by the following facts:

One J. W. Davidson, of Monmouth, Ill., writes Mr. Hill some time since that he had received a pamphlet purporting to contain the amnesty debate, and that his (Mr. Hill's) speech is so eliminated and garbled that from it no one can correctly judge of "the position Mr. Hill assumed during that debate." To this Mr. Hill hastens to reply at length. He makes the following charges and denunciations. Speaking of the pamphlet, he says:

"It purports to contain the speeches of Mr. Blaine, Mr. Garfield, and myself on what is known as the amnesty debate. I find my own speech most grossly and adroitly mutilated. Many entire sentences are cut out, and many other sentences and paragraphs are cut up and garbled with a manifest purpose to alter and misrepresent the real meaning, temper, and argument of my speech.

* * * * *

"I do not know who got up this dirty pamphlet. It is a deliberate falsehood and a studied attempt to deceive. Every man who sends it to another, with knowledge of its character, is guilty of the falsehood, and avows thereby his desire to deceive the people. Every honest man to whom it is sent will feel insulted, and he is insulted."

He adds among other comments that—"I called the attention of one of the best Republicans in Congress to this pamphlet, desiring to see how he regarded it. He only laughed and said, 'It is bad, I admit, but it is politics, and you must expect it.' Is this true? Is this politics? If so, is anything safe? Have we reached the point where leaders are willing to deceive and the people are willing to be deceived? If so, then our greatest statesman is the greatest liar in the country!'

Before showing the folly and falsehood of Mr. Hill's uncivil comments, it will be well to remind him and the country that, if his criticisms are truthful and deserved, then Mr. Hill himself is the greatest of offenders. The speech which Mr. Hill says is so garbled is, as far as republished, taken word for word from the Congressional Record. But it is not the speech Mr. Hill delivered on the floor of the House of Representatives. That speech Mr. Hill himself deliberately suppressed, substituting for the verbatim copy which the official reporters prepared one presenting in various essential and important aspects and arguments and references of a different character and tone from those he uttered in debate. Mr. Hill went to the length, unknown before in the annals of Congressional garbling, of eliminating a spirited colloquy between the Hon. Eugene Hale, of Maine, and himself. He left only, to use his own words, "many entire sentences," that were uttered on the floor; and he so altered others as to show "a manifest purpose to alter and misrepresent the real meaning, temper, and argument" of the speech as actually delivered. There can be no doubt but that in so doing Mr. Hill engaged in a "a deliberate falsehood and a studied attempt to deceive." Mr. Hill, in so garbling his real argument and printing the eliminated one in the Record, was guilty of the falsehood he charges against others, "and avows thereby his desire to deceive the people." This, too, he did in his capacity as a Representative, and by means of a channel supposed to be correct—at least ought to be from its official character.

Mr. Hill complains of this campaign copy of his so-called speech being "garbled," "eliminated," &c. We are authorized to say that the remedy lies in Mr. Hill's own hands. If he will consent to the preparation of a correct copy from the verbatim notes made of his speech as delivered and reported, (not as printed,) and will furnish it to us, the same will be at once put in type and circulated throughout the country. This also to the extent of as many copies as may be called for. It would be the best possible campaign document that Republicans could circulate. But let it be the genuine article, and not "garbled" and "eliminated," according to the wisdom which came to Mr. Hill in cooler moments, or by the advice of political friends.

However, the pamphlet assailed by Mr. Hill does not in any manner justify his use of abusive epithets. It contains thirty-two pages, does not purport to contain the whole debate on amnesty, but gives accurately, honestly, and without "garbling," as far as it goes, the main features of that remarkable discussion. As a matter of fact it could not be "garbled," as Mr. Hill seeks to misrepresent. The postal laws allow the franking by members of Congress of the Congressional Record, or any part thereof, or of reprints therefrom. To secure the advantage of this provision it must be rigidly adhered to. The person by whom the amnesty debate was prepared for the press states that the rule he followed (being limited to thirty-two pamphlet pages for all) was to give, as has been done, the opening speech in full of Mr. Blaine, then as much of Mr. Hill's as showed clearly and honestly the line of his argument, and preserved his own statement of real and alleged facts, eliminating only the side issues and rhetorical flourishes. This was followed by Mr. Garfield's speech in full, because it is a clear and logical reply to the so-called historical assumptions and assaults of the Georgian. The remainder of the debate is very much cut down, and Mr. Blaine, especially, has much more reason to complain of the elimination made in his last two incisive speeches and running debates than Mr. Hill has in regard to the presentation of the speech he printed, but did not deliver.

Mr. Hill undertook to prove that the Confederacy did all it could by law and regulation to prevent suffering among the Union prisoners in its hands; that such suffering as ensued was due in part to the inevitable horrors of war, but far more to the cruel policy in regard to devastation, the blockade, and refusal to exchange on our part, than to all other causes combined. In addition to these pleas in extenuation, Mr. Hill made a deliberate attack on the United States Government and policy, charging that our treatment of prisoners was worse than theirs, and that greater mortality ensued. In the speech printed in the Record, Mr. Hill toned down the asperity of his assertions a good deal. In preparing the speech for publication as a campaign document an honest effort was made to show by Mr. Hill's own words (so-called) the full extent of his argument.

But if he really feels aggrieved, as he pretends, and considers himself foully treated, the remedy is in his own hands. Republicans will be glad to give the genuine speech the benefit of their machinery and so circulate it to the fullest extent. Will Mr. Hill accept this offer and let the real speech be printed verbatim et literatim? This offer is made by authority. Will Mr. Hill accept it? We pledge ourselves to its fulfillment. If not, let him forever hereafter hold his peace and not unnecessarily soil his mouth or pen with false accusations.

EDUCATION IN FRANCE.

Mr. Waddington, the French Minister of Public Instruction and Worship, a Republican, delivered toward the end of April an important address before the United Scientific Societies of the Sorbonne (Paris) in which he indicates the method of reforms in the school system which he purposes introducing. He says:

"The government, while guaranteeing full liberty of thought and conscience, should, at the same time, maintain the rights of the State against the encroachments of the Church. The standard of sciences should be elevated, and a new and freer life in science and spiritual matters be promoted. France must, therefore, establish real universities in the different parts of the country; I mean such universities as will unite in a whole the single faculties hitherto in existence in various places, and will represent all branches of science combined, as it is now done in Germany. The universities should not be like isolated sparks rising here and there, but like great and strong flames illuminating a whole province. Furthermore, the higher instructions of learning, the gymnasium, and the polytechnical schools should be considerably improved; but above all, the elementary and grammar schools should be brought under the control of the government; compulsory instruction should be introduced and disciplinary punishment be inflicted upon the pupils for neglect of attendance at public school. The Republic and the right of universal suffrage cannot exist without education and the general diffusion of knowledge."

This highly promising programme of the French Minister of Public Instruction is in utter opposition to the "Congress of the Catholic Committees" in Paris, which try to have the school system continued under the control of the clergy.

The same Ultramontane Congress protested with all its power, by resolutions, against public instruction being withdrawn from the control of the Church and given up to the government. The Cardinal Archbishop who presided at that Congress asserted, in utter variance with history, that the decay of public information was solely attributable to the State power, and the Bishop of Nismes even went so far as to openly predict the speedy downfall of the Republic. The campaign of the Ultramontanists against the Republic, liberty, and progress is in full blaze in France.

THE following table affords an indication of the growth of necessary trades and occupations, and shows that the South, as a section, is by no means so depressed industrially as it is for political purposes constantly claimed:

POVERTY OF THE SOUTH—GEORGIA AND TEXAS.

The ex-Postmaster General of the former Slaveholders' Confederacy, Mr. Reagan, has several times alluded on the floor of the House of Representatives, during the present session, to the poverty-stricken condition of his State. In one notable instance he met with a sharp reply from the Hon. Martin I. Townsend, of New York, who soon convinced the House that he possessed an accurate knowledge of business affairs in the Lone Star State. Georgia is sometimes cited in proof of the truth of the jeremiads Southern Democrats and their allies are constantly sending forth.

Two tables are herewith presented which certainly do not carry out the idea of general depression; on the contrary, they show a steady advance in the valuation of taxable property in both States. Both tables are compiled from State reports, that for Georgia, now annexed, being made up from the returns published in the Report of 1875, made by the Comptroller General for the State of Georgia. It gives, as will be seen, for that State, the—

TOTAL VALUATION OF PROPERTY.

Year.	All other property, (personal,) except annual crops.	Increase.	Decrease.	Aggregate value of whole property.	Increase.
1868.....	$28,554,426	$191,235,520
1869.....	29,167,194	$2,612,768	204,481,706	$13,246,186
1870.....	30,985,471	1,828,277	226,329,769	21,848,063
1871.....	30,123,998	$811,473	234,492,468	8,162,699
1872.....	28,335,151	1,788,847	244,219,416	9,726,948
1873.....	30,249,764	1,914,613	259,593,622	15,374,206
1874.....	32,948,158	2,698,394	273,068,292	13,498,670

It will be seen that there has been a total increase in the aggregate value of property from 1868 to 1874—seven years—of not less than $81,857,772. This is by no means an evidence of decadence, especially when it is remembered, also, that Georgia was pretty thoroughly devastated by the war and its operations.

Taking some details from the table out of which the foregoing is compiled, and it will be found that the increase of acres of land returned for taxation in 1874 over 1868 was 2,182,084 acres. The total increase in the value thereof was $18,976,205. The increase in the number of farm hands employed in 1874 over 1868 was 27,673. In 1873 it was 38,631. The increase in the value of furniture for plantation and mechanical purposes (the latter being returned only when above $300 in value) in 1874 over 1868 was not less than $12,400,886, a rather striking evidence of the greater diffusion of personal property and prosperity, which is a characteristic of free society.

The increase in the value of city and town lots, of money on hand, and in that of merchandise, are also illustrative of the changes produced by free labor. The value of town lots, etc., in 1868 was $40,315,621; in 1874 it is stated at $57,218,248—an increase of $16,902,627. The amount of money on hand or of solvent debts had increased in 1874 over 1868, on a total of $38,507,465, to the amount of $15,288,945. The value of merchandise on hand had also increased to the extent of $3,790,294 in 1874, on a total valuation of $13,766,587. The increase in the value of cotton factories over 1869 was in 1874, $1,354,041; in iron foundries, $258,660; in national banks over 1869, $6,132,035. These facts are all indicative of the beneficial changes that have been already wrought. But how much greater would be the prosperity if the bellicose politicians, the disgruntled clergy, irate ladies, and fire-eating editors could only be made to see the advantages that would come in every way from such a hearty acceptance, socially and economically, as well as politically, of the conditions that have already resulted from that, to them, blessing in disguise, the defeat of the "lost cause!" The large sums distributed as wages must alone produce a revolution in trade and industry. The facts given are in evidence.

Turning to Texas, and the proofs of the beneficial changes already produced by free labor are quite as striking. The following table is worth examination :

Year.	Number of acres.	Value.	Value town lots.	Horses, sheep, cattle.		Merchandise.	Money on hand or at inter't.	Miscellaneous.	Total valuation.	Changes in value of taxable property.
				No.	Value.

ASSESSED VALUE OF TAXABLE PROPERTY IN TEXAS.

[Per State Reports.]

The increase in the value of the different valuations in 1874 over the figures of 1867 is as follows :

Acres of land.....	1,596,575
In value.....	$17,576,519
Town lots, in value	15,808,306
Merchandise.....	4,896,445
Money on hand, etc.....	5,437,425
Miscellaneous	9,955,682

Total increase on these valuations .. 53,674,397
Decrease in the valuation of horses, sheep, and cattle, 1874 on that of 1867 641,977

Total increase 53,032,420

These figures are not entirely reliable, as examination of the reports in detail show imperfect assessments, and, as a consequence, valuations also. But even then they present a gratifying exhibit. The contrast might be still further carried out, but these figures are sufficient to indicate that the States named, at least, are not in a suffering condition, and they show conclusively that the result of free institutions is a material advancement at least.

WHO CAN HESITATE IN THEIR CHOICE.—

When the Democratic party laid down its trust in despair and was about to surrender the Union to those who had conspired against it, the Republican party took up the trust, and, grappling with armed rebellion, crushed it after a desperate struggle, thereby saving the Union. For the cowardice and disloyalty shown in the face of danger the Democratic party deserves the condemnation of the American people. For its courage and patriotism in overcoming the rebellion and for its wisdom in restoring the States to their former rights and privileges the Republican party deserves the thanks, not only of this country, but of the civilized world. Who that loves his country can hesitate as to which party he should support in the coming struggle?

BARREN OF GOOD RESULTS.—The Democrats have had full control of the House of Representatives for the past six months. What have they done to merit public confidence and future support? Nothing! Their labors have been barren of any good results. The people's time and money have been recklessly squandered on fruitless investigations, started for no other purpose than to give the Democratic party a little political capital in the Presidential campaign. They will not only fail to secure this capital, but they are likely to lose what little they had formerly gained.

LET US HAVE PEACE.

There was great significance in the watchword that General Grant gave to the Republican party—"Let us have Peace!"

"The first want of every nation," said Mr. Seward in 1844, "is peace, the last is peace. It wants peace always. So our forefathers understood the philosophy of government; for they established a system which dispensed with even the forces necessary for perfect defense rather than cumber it with such as might tempt it to unnecessary collision with other states. A democratic government has no adaptation to war. War, however brief its duration, and however light its calamities, deranges all social industry, subverts order, and corrupts public morals. The first element, then, of our social happiness and security is PEACE."

It is a fact never to be forgotten that all the wars that have afflicted this nation since it was organized were brought on by the Democratic party—the causeless and fruitless war of 1812, the Florida war, the Mexican war, and the war of the Rebellion. All these owe their origin to the action of the Democratic party, and if it regains power how soon may we expect another war?

Among the brightest pages of our nation's history will be those which record the successful results of the great Geneva Arbitration. The Republican party can point to it as one of its greatest achievements in the administration of government. The Republican party indeed stands for peace as it does for freedom and progress. None of these great interests can be intrusted to the hands of the so-called Democratic party. That party has not so conducted itself in the past as to secure the confidence of a peace loving people, while the Republican party rests not under even the suspicion of its devotion to humane principles, nor can it fall under any such suspicion. It seeks no other field for its activity than the improvement of the resources of the country. Its ambition is for peaceful enterprises within our own expansive borders, avoiding if possible collision with foreign powers.

Although it has been remarked* that every great international exposition has been followed by a great war, it is nevertheless true that the influence of such gatherings of the people of different nations must be peaceful. Whether the great Centennial Exposition to be held during this year in Philadelphia, the City of Brotherly Love, shall contribute to this end we wait to see. It would have more effect if it combined with its exhibitions and displays some kind of an international congress. Last year there was held in Holland a congress advocating the principles that "human society belongs to man—a community of nations, girded with the armament of justice, ordered and perfected by equal and universal law—arbitrating the claims of every member, and conserving the welfare of the whole."

We indulge in no over-sanguine hopes of "universal peace" even among the most enlightened and Christian nations. That is something in the dim and distant future. But every arbitration convention is a step toward it. Moreover, nations and peoples are growing more and more practical. They are beginning to ask, "Does it pay?" They count the cost. Germany finds that of the total expenses required to carry on the government 26 per cent. is absorbed by the army; in France 31 per cent.; in Great Britain the same; in Russia 36 per cent.; in the United States only about 6 per cent. The standing army in Germany in time of peace costs the government annually about 360,000,000 of reichsmarks, equal to $90,000,000, excluding the loss of the labor, productive industry, of 438,000 men and nearly 100,000 horses. On this basis the appropriations for the expense of the army have been made for seven years in advance.

In Italy, as in Germany, the army is recruited from the able-bodied men of the country—for the first line from the ages between 20 and 31; for the second 31 to 36; for the third 36 to 55. In Italy men under

*Rev. J. P. Thompson, D. D., L. L. D., formerly of New York, now a resident of Berlin, Germany, an able writer on the subject of peace in Europe, &c.

20 years of age may serve one year before they are 20 and thus be exempt from further service unless in case of war. In time of war no able-bodied man can escape service or send a substitute. It is the same in Germany and France. It is contended in these countries that while a large standing army is an evil that it nevertheless does some good. The army is a school; and no peasant returns home, it is said, after his five years' service without being much improved, acquiring valuable instruction in the regimental schools, while his mind is enlarged by acquaintance with all parts of his country. His physical condition is no less improved by regular exercise in the open air, and other advantages.

The first line of the Italian army comprises 300,000 men and 40,000 horses; the second 250,000 men; the third 200,000.

The navy of Italy is rapidly augmenting and improving in character. About seventy men of war have recently been sold to make place for vessels of more modern construction. With two years of peace Italy expects to have a navy equal to that of Germany or of Spain.

We take these two nations, Germany and Italy, as the two representatives of military power in Europe. Although this is a time of peace we see little evidence in European governments of a desire to reduce their armies to any serious extent. The people, however, who feel the burden of great armies in times of peace, are considering the subject.

They are opposed at least to wars of conquest and ambition, while they are willing to make any sacrifices to repel the attacks of neighboring powers.

The enormous expenses incurred in the maintenance of armies in Europe even in times of peace, and the no less enormous drain upon the productive industries of their respective countries, caused by such large bodies of mere consumers, we repeat, raise the question, Is there no relief? Arbitration as a substitute for war seems to be the only expedient. But arbitration must be tried. We doubt if the British Government was quite won over to its unfailing expediency by the result of the Geneva Arbitration. The United States, on the other hand, is well satisfied. Therefore much time and experience will be needed to commend arbitration to even the most civilized nations. It would seem that disputes about property or territory, as well as questions affecting persons, ambassadors, emigrants, refugees, &c., might easily be left for settlement to some other arbitrament than war. Other differences will gradually come to be settled by arbitration.

That it is possible to bring men of even jealous nations into harmonious relations where the object is science or philanthropy was evidenced by the Geographical Congress which recently assembled in Paris, when an eminent German geologist presided over one of its sessions. German travelers recounted their explorations, German authorities were quoted, and German societies and savans received prizes and honors. In this Congress, as at that held in Holland, the Russian, the German, the Hollander, the Swede, the Belgian, the Englishman, the Frenchman, the Italian, the Hungarian, each in his own tongue, paid tribute to the grand idea of universal brotherhood. The Marshal President of France, the heir to the throne of Russia, and the Vice Admiral of France were found assisting the more active members of the Geographical Congress.

How far can great nations be induced to have recourse to arbitration as a substitute for war is a question now receiving considerable attention.

In this interest was instituted the "Association for the Reform and Codification of the Law of Nations," which claims to be the embodiment and expression of a conviction for a long time cherished by leading publicists and statesmen of different countries of the desirableness and the practicability of a well defined and settled international law, and an international tribunal, as a provision for regulating the relations of nations to each other, and adjusting their differences by peaceful methods, and thus securing international justice.

The association had its origin in the year 1871, while the Washington Treaty and the Geneva Arbitration were under consideration and likely to result in the satisfactory and peaceable settlement of the grave differences between Great Britain and the United States of America. A "call" for an "International Congress" was prepared by Elihu Burritt and the Secretary, James B. Miles, in consultation together, which resulted in a meeting at Brussels in October, 1873. Among those who assembled at the Conference were distinguished men from Italy, Spain, England, Holland, and the United States. It received also the countenance of such Americans as Theodore D. Woolsey, Reverdy Johnson, Emory Washburne, Charles Francis Adams, and other eminent jurists and statesmen.

After full and able discussion, in which most of the members participated, the Conference adopted unanimously the following resolution:

"The Conference declares that an international code, defining with all the precision possible the rights and duties of nations and of their members, is eminently desirable in the interest of peace, of friendly relations, and of the common prosperity. It is therefore of opinion that nothing should be neglected to arrive at the preparation and adoption of such code. The Conference reserves the question of judging to what point the codification of the law of nations should be simply scientific, and to what point it should be embodied in treaties or conventions formally accepted by sovereign States.

"The Conference declares that it regards arbitration the means essentially just, reasonable, and even obligatory on nations, of terminating international differences which cannot be settled by negotiation. It abstains from affirming that this means can be applied in all cases without exception. But it believes these exceptions to be rare. And it is of opinion that no difference ought to be considered insoluble until after a complete exposition of the matter in dispute, after a reasonable delay, and after the exhaustion of all pacific means of adjustment."

Among the testimonies respecting the success of this mission is the following extract from the letter of an English gentleman:

"The marked attention which you have elicited for the object of your interesting mission from a number of the most eminent men in Europe, including such foremost statesmen (practical men removed to the furthest extent possible from mere theorists or utopian dreamers) as Mr. Gladstone, our Prime Minister, M. Drouyn de Lhuys, formerly Prime Minister of France under the Emperor Napoleon III., and Count Sclopis, President of the Geneva Tribunal—this is in itself a great work achieved."

At the Congress at The Hague in 1875 an effort was made by Judge Peabody, Chancellor Pruyn, and other American delegates, to adjourn to meet in the United States in 1876, but it was unsuccessful.

IS THIS HOSTILITY TO THE SOUTH?

Under the requirements of the laws by which lands were granted in aid of railroad construction to the several States several million acres in the Southern States reverted to the public domain at the close of the rebellion, owing to the non-completion of the roads to which they had been devoted. The total was about eleven million acres. A considerable proportion of this has been assigned to settlers in farms of forty and eighty acres each. But Congress has not been unmindful of the South since the surrender at Appomattox, as the following statement of grants or renewals will prove:

Date of law.	State.	No. of acres.
1869	Alabama	897,920 renewal
1871	Alabama	576,000 renewal
1866	Arkansas	966,722 renewal
1866	Arkansas	550,525 renewal
1866	Arkansas	864,000 new grant
1870	Louisiana	1,666,722 new grant
Total		5,521,889

Grants to corporations.		Acres.
1871	Southern Pacific	3,520,000
1871	Texas Pacific	18,000,000
1871	New Orleans, Baton Rouge, and Vicksburg	4,000,000
		25,520,000

To this total should be added 1,582,718 acres granted to Missouri in 1866 for the construction of two railroads directly advancing the interests of Tennessee and Arkansas. These make a total of—

	Acres.
To the reconstructed States	5,521,889
To corporations direct, (within those States)	4,000,000
To corporations for Southern roads, and within the Territories	21,520,000
To Missouri for Southwestern connections	1,582,718
Total	32,624,607

BOURBON Democracy relies upon a united South in the coming Presidential struggle. Republicans should do their best to secure a united North. To this end, effective organization should take place in every town and city of the Northern States. The issue involved is the life of the nation, and to place this issue properly before the people should be the duty of true citizens everywhere.

A REPUBLICAN SUCCESS NECESSARY TO PROTECT THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

A short time since, when the chiefs of the Democratic party were laying out their plans for the coming Presidential campaign, one of the most influential of our Democratic contemporaries in the West advised them to attack the REPUBLICAN PARTY ON ITS RECORD as the best means of securing Democratic success. No Republican can have the slightest objection to such a course. It is an appeal "to the law and to the testimony;" and such an appeal is always to be welcomed, because the record of the Republican party has passed into history, and the most plausible doubts will be resolved into the most brilliant certainty in the light of facts which can be produced on all points wherein the country has been served with honesty or protected from injury which the partisan spirit of the Democracy deliberately sought to inflict upon it.

Take for instance the injury inflicted upon the national credit at home and abroad by the Democratic party. The Democratic party is responsible as an accessory both before and after the rebellion of the South. Democratic leaders were in communication with the disloyal leaders of the South, and knew how treason was spreading and what preparations were made for the outbreak of the war. The Democratic party were in power up to the year 1860. In view of what the Democratic party knew as about to take place in the South it would admit to the public service but two classes of men, viz: Southerners who were prepared to destroy the Union to preserve slavery, or Northern men with Southern proclivities. These men were sent abroad as ministers and consuls; and the consequence was that in every court of continental Europe, in England, and the other courts of the world, the utterances of the public servants of the United States, paid by the people, were impudently disloyal. These public servants, professing to worship slavery, gravely announced to foreign statesmen that the Union would be destroyed by violence if the intelligent freemen of the North did not cease to interfere with the South and its peculiar institution. So earnest had been the communications of some of the ambassadors, and so boastful had they been of the high and Christian character of Southerners, "born to command," as they said, but failing to say "the plantation slaves, ignorant as cattle though in the form of men and women," that statesmen were perplexed, and had to wait the arrival of Republican successors until they could understand events.

The effect of the labors of disloyal ambassadors and other emissaries was to misrepresent the resources of the South by ridiculous boasting, and to undervalue the resources of the North; the combined effect of which was to discredit the national securities and alarm the holders abroad. The same course was pursued at home; and the Government had to raise money on the best terms it could, but often at a less amount than the face value of the bond, and at a high rate of interest. This early and great loss to the people is distinctly traceable to the disloyal utterances of the Democratic party at an important crisis in the country's history.

At last the country put aside the Democratic party as utterly untrustworthy, and the Republican party assumed the control of every national interest. Its first duty was to save the Union. To do this on the battlefield, on the men-of-war, and in the council of State was the natural instinct of Republicans. The grand armies of the Republic were recruited under the command of soldiers who loved the Union, and were willing, men and officers, to shed their blood for its preservation. While the war was being fought Republican statesmen were preparing the ways and means for raising money. The public mind had to be disabused of the evil seed the Democratic party had sown in it. Patriots, in whom the people trusted, had to come forward and pledge the faith of the Nation that the pledges of the Republican party should be kept. These pledges were enacted into law; and as the Nation's honor was in the keeping of a Republican Congress the faith reposed in the Republican party at home extended to capitalists abroad, and the bonds of the United States were lifted from the cloud which oppressed them, and they rose to par and then to a premium; and they are at a premium to-day. But the Democratic party have never had patriotism enough to greet the recovery of our bonds with favor. Leading Democrats have always shown a desire to break faith with the Nation and the Nation's creditors whenever the finances have been the subject of debate in Congress. And those debates seem always to have been aimed to affect disastrously our credit abroad. But the wisdom and sincerity of the Government were too apparent to foreign capitalists to cause any permanent derangement, and the foreign bondholder has come to look upon the Republican party as his greatest safeguard, and the same may be said of the bondholder at home.

Persons who hold American securities abroad are by no means ignorant of the record of the Republican party. They know, too, the record of the Democratic party and will not put any trust in it. They say that a political party like the Democratic party, that would permit the Southern slaveowners to destroy the Union, is worthy of no confidence whatever. It is rumored that the evil record of the Democratic party has given rise to an expression of feeling in a quarter that is likely to be heeded. Belmont & Co., of New York, are bankers and Democrats. They are also the agents of the Rothschilds, whose wealth is well known. The Rothschilds have large pecuniary interests in this country, and they have a right to express themselves in a way that shall indicate that they wish their property protected. They are understood to have conveyed to Mr. Belmont their hope that a Republican President may be elected; for if the Republican party is successful they will regard their large investments in our public funds as safe.

This is a very important piece of intelligence, as coming from the wealthiest and shrewdest of foreign capitalists. Nor are they the only capitalists that entertain the opinion of the safety of investments while the Republican party is in power. But what a glowing commentary upon the record of the Republican party! Surely on that record Republicans may go to the country. There is nothing in it to be ashamed of. The Republican party saved the Nation and restored the national credit; and as the majority of American citizens are Republicans the country expects every man to do his duty at the polls, and the banner of the Republican party will float high in the breeze. The ensuing Presidential election is the most important since the days of Washington. A Republican President will assure to the people the fruits of the war, will require the South to protect the rights of all men before the law, and will put an end to the lawless disloyalty and terror now prevailing in the Democratic Southern States. Republicans, take advantage of the opportunity; and, animated with fidelity to the cause of freedom and love of country, let not one ballot be absent when the time comes to cast them.

A DOZEN POINTS.

We give twelve good points why the Republican party should be preferred to Democracy. A hundred equally as good could be given:

1. It represents the intelligence and loyalty of the nation.
2. It is the champion of free education, and an advocate of the rights of labor.
3. It preserved the Republic in face of the greatest rebellion of modern times.
4. It restored—through its legislative wisdom—the Southern States to all their former rights and privileges in the Union.
5. It abolished slavery.
6. It made freedom universal.
7. It settled the vexed San Juan boundary question.
8. It obtained $15,000,000 from England, and settled amicably the Alabama depredation question.
9. It gave to the nation a good national banking system.
10. It has paid nearly $600,000,000 of the national debt.
11. It built the Pacific railroad.
12. It has opened a profitable commerce with Eastern nations through favorable treaties.

GENERAL GRANT—THE SIOUX BRAVE "TAKE THINGS."

One of the worst features of newspaper attacks upon public men is that it spares neither worth, virtue, nor manhood. When a journal passes the bounds of truth and decency it cannot complain of its loss of influence, for it has taken the steps most calculated to secure it. Not only does it lose its influence, but it loses also any reputation that it might have had for truth by indulging in this species of slander; and it deserves the rebuke of right-thinking men when administered in the way most likely to be felt the keenest, a diminution of its subscription list. What claim has the editor of a newspaper to the regard of his fellow men when he seeks to smirch and belittle the character of those whom the people have exalted by reason of the great services they rendered to the country? General Grant has been exposed to incessant attacks from a certain class of the press. These attacks have been undeserved, and have shown that the editors making them are unable to appreciate deeds which will make the name of U. S. Grant live in the history of the country his military ability helped to save. And it may safely be said, that when he shall have retired from the Presidency and the noise of political clamor shall have died away his name will shine forth with renewed luster, and the remembrance of his great deeds be revived.

The editor of the Chicago Times is anxious, however, to excel in meanness, and his ambition has, perhaps, met with its match, and is not likely to be troublesome for some time to come. Where scandal is the source of wit very little can be expected, but that little, like the Australian boomerang, may come back and hurt the person throwing it. The Chicago Times has sufficient sympathy to fraternize with the unreconstructed Southern Democrats who sought to destroy the Union. To please this class of friends, the editor opened its columns to the publication of this interesting item:

"A Sioux brave is named Take Things—Take Things is Indian for Grant."

Of course every Democrat and rebel was expected to roar themselves black in the face at the joke; and some of them "laughed consumedly." Yet it was a good joke, far too good to be allowed to slide into oblivion. Moreover that joke had a mission to perform; and in the performance of that mission good men laughed contentedly, while rebels regarded it with a wry face. The Sioux brave Take Things, that reminded people of General Grant, recalled vividly to the recollection of another writer for the press what the Chicago editor had no wish to remember. He said of General Grant, as Take Things:

"Yes; we recall it now; he took Donelson, Petersburg, Richmond, and other things which the rebels cannot deny, as they would not have given them had they been able to hold them, but which having been taken from them by General Grant, were a fitting prelude to the day of Appomattox, when every rebel in Lee's army would have embraced Grant's legs to be assured of the safety of his neck."

BORROWING TROUBLE.—The Democracy, through its agents in the House of Representatives, have been trying for the past six months to discover a few faults in the Republican party out of which they can make political capital. If one half the labor had been expended to give due credit to Republican virtues the faults of the party would have appeared so trifling that even Democrats would have united in praising it as the most perfect political organization ever devised by wisdom and patriotism. The astronomer who searches the surface of the sun for the dark spots that are known to be there, may borrow trouble over the ultimate extinguishment of the fiery orb. But to those who enjoy the light, and who receive health and comfort from the warm sunshine, the dark spots bring no anxiety, for they are swallowed up in the brilliancy of the rays emitted. So with the few spots that are found on the record of Republicanism. They may trouble the Clymers, and Randalls, and the ex-Confederate astronomers of the House; but the people care nothing for them, for they know they are the rare exceptions and not the rule in the Administration of the Republican party.

THE WORK OF THE FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

STATE OF LEGISLATION.

This day (Wednesday, June 14, 1876) the business of Congress lingers unfinished. Nothing of consequence has been perfected since our last month's report. The time has been largely occupied in political maneuvers preliminary to the nominating Presidential conventions. To-day the Republican convention meets at Cincinnati, and for many days the air has been rife with speculation as to the successful aspirant. Almost the entire press of the country has been engrossed with these approaching great events. Even the Centennial has for the day been eclipsed in the excitement which centers in the Presidential question. In ten days the Democratic convention will meet in St. Louis to make their nomination, and all calculation as to its choice is as much at fault as the reckoning of the soothsayers in the Republican camp. But the interest in these rival movements is sufficient to explain many things in regard to the action of Congress during the past month.

THE HOUSE.

The House, while professing to devote its time to the legitimate business before it, has really been frittering away the precious period in professions of economy and reform and in prosecuting its numerous investigations. Nothing has been done with the appropriation bills now pending. The most important of these bills—without which, after this month, the Government will have to suspend operations for want of money—lies as it came from the Senate, with more than a thousand amendments, and some of them very serious, yet to be considered. Reports from some of the investigating committees have been made. Ex-Minister Schenck, while acquitted of any intentional or moral wrong, has been censured for his careless connection with the affairs which originated the Emma Mine scandal. Mr. A. M. Clapp, the Congressional Printer, has also been severely handled, with a recommendation that he be tried in the courts for gross malfeasance in office. Some of the contested election cases have been disposed of, and one Republican, Mr. Morey, from Louisiana, has been unseated. The balance of these personal matters, with the exception of the case of Mr. Speaker Kerr, hangs still in inextricable confusion. The Democratic leaders of the House, such as Messrs. Knott, Randall, and Hill, have proved utterly incompetent and unfit for the management of affairs. What with the discussions on the tariff, on the different schemes of the currency, and the public debt, on the necessities and administrations of the different branches of the Government, and especially in the action concerning individual cases, they have brought the whole round of legislative questions into the most imminent peril.

Exasperated by the charges brought against Mr. Doorkeeper Fitzhugh, and more than all by the ignorant and silly letter he wrote to a friend in Texas, they rushed madly upon him, and forthwith turned him out of his office.

MR. BLAINE'S TRIUMPH.

But the grand day of the session was Monday, June 5th, when Mr. Blaine rose to a personal explanation. The sub-committee of the Judiciary Committee of the House had called Mr. Blaine before them to explain his connection with certain alleged transactions of the Kansas Pacific and the Northern Pacific railroad. They had also summoned from Boston one James Mulligan, who was said to have possession of some private letters of Mr. Blaine, written to his business partner, Mr. Warren Fisher, which if published would be very damaging to Mr. Blaine. That Mulligan should have possession of these letters and hold them as a menace over Mr. Blaine was an enormous outrage, and tended to excite him to the highest pitch of feeling. He immediately sought an interview with Mulligan, and after considerable effort succeeded in getting these letters into his hands. The committee demanded the letters, which Mr. Blaine refused to submit. This placed him in a wholly false position before the public, and was calculated to do him immense injury in the public mind. Already suspicions were put afloat that Mr. Blaine withheld the letters through fear of exposure.

He was charged likewise with having obtained possession of the letters in a dishonorable manner. This was the situation when he rose to speak on the occasion referred to. He recited the history of the resolutions of investigation under which the case had thus far proceeded. He then made a splendid defense of the right of property in the citizen, and, rising to a high pitch of energy, he defied the House to take those letters from him. He dared any man to join issue with him upon that point. Then, having vindicated himself in his course on that subject, and drawing from his pocket a package of papers which he held up, he proceeded to say, notwithstanding his mortification in the premises, that, rather than submit to the suspicions and evil surmises engendered by his withholding the letters, he would throw himself on the confidence of forty-four millions of people, and would now himself read the letters to the House and the country. This was the signal for the most spontaneous and long-continued applause all over the Hall. Then, in a calm, clear voice, he went through with the reading, and when he had finished he proceeded to say that but one piece of testimony was wanting to make the proof of his innocence complete, and that was the statement of Josiah Caldwell, now in Europe, and turning to Mr. Knott, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, he asked if he had heard from Mr. Caldwell. Mr. Knott was silent or evaded a reply. Mr. Blaine then, advancing from his desk toward Mr. Knott, asked if on last Thursday morning, about the hour of eight o'clock, he did not receive a telegram from Mr. Caldwell. Mr. Knott still evaded a frank and full reply. Then Mr. Blaine, stepping still toward him with a majesty and power of action perfectly sublime, said, "I charge you that you did so receive a telegram from Caldwell which perfectly exonerated me, and that you have suppressed it!" This was the moment when the most terrible storm of excitement broke from every quarter of the House. The Speaker's gavel was wholly ineffectual to quell the tumult, in the midst of which Mr. Blaine, having offered a resolution requiring the Judiciary Committee to produce the telegram in question before the House, resumed his seat. Mr. Hunton, chairman of the sub-investigating committee, went into a long explanation, followed by Mr. Knott, who attempted to quote from the classics and to perpetrate some stale witticisms, but the battle had been fought and the victory won. Mr. Blaine was triumphant, and many an eye glistened with pride and admiration at his noble action and manly bearing. Nothing that the Democrats could say or do could roll back the tide of defeat. They were routed by one man—"horse, foot, and dragoons," and never appeared in any phase of their brief career so utterly insignificant as they did that day before him. There have been many scenes of wild excitement in Congress, but never any that surpassed, even if they equalled, this. The oldest members, men who have been long in public life, expressed it as their opinion that at no time in the history of the American Congress had there been a scene to equal it. It was with the greatest sympathy and sadness that the tidings spread through the city that Mr. Blaine had been stricken down with a serious attack on the brain at the steps of the church where he had walked with his wife on last Sunday morning. The greatest anxiety has been felt in his case—but now on this day of the assembling of the Convention at Cincinnati, where he is a prominent candidate, the telegrams of the hour announce his assured recovery.

SPEAKER KERR.

This gentleman has for some time past been in declining health and obliged for a considerable portion of the time to vacate his chair in search of relief. Some month or more ago a charge was brought against him by one Harney, of New York, for having received $450 as the price of obtaining an appointment for a Captain Green in the United States army some ten years ago. Harney swore before the committee that he himself paid Mr. Kerr the money. It appears from the documentary evidence in the Department that Mr. Kerr did procure the aforesaid appointment, but he swears as positively that Harney paid him no money. On this question of veracity between the two men the personal good character of Mr. Kerr has availed him much, while an investigation into the antecedents of the man Harney shows that he is capable of almost anything to blacken the character of others.

The other day the committee made a unanimous report exonerating the Speaker, when Messrs. Danford and Hurlbut, both Republicans, without regard of political or party considerations, addressed some admirable remarks to the House and the country in regard to the villainous assaults upon the character and reputation of public men now so much in vogue, and when the vote was taken General Garfield, another Republican, proposed that it should be taken by rising, when every member on both sides of the chamber stood up with a hearty good-will. Had this generous example been followed in some other cases it would have been to the credit of the Democratic side, as well as a well-merited rebuke to liars and perjurers, who from the basest motives lie in wait to strike at those who may be in any way exposed to their attacks.

THE SENATE.

The business of the session is expedited in the Senate by the fact that the number of members is so much smaller than in the House, and the most necessary measures have been generally well and promptly disposed of. The legislative appropriation bill greatly changed was sent back to the House in a few days, where it now remains.

About two and a half weeks of the last month have been occupied with the discussion and decision of the question of jurisdiction in the impeachment of General Belknap. After consuming some twelve days in secret session on this point the Senate has decided that it will take jurisdiction of the case by a vote of 37 to 29, not a two-thirds vote. Friday, June 16, was fixed as the day when the Senate as a court would meet, to give an opportunity to both sides for arrangements in regard to witnesses, and July 6 as the day when the trial shall commence. The respondent has already furnished a list of 197 witnesses whom he intends to call in his defense; and besides his counsel will most likely raise now another preliminary question, as to the vote on jurisdiction. It was not a two-thirds vote, and they will contend that those Senators who voted in the negative can not conscientiously sit in the trial of the case. But it is not likely that this question will be long continued, since the principle in law is everywhere recognized that the minority of a court is bound by the decision of the majority. The work before the Senate in this trial, together with the other business, gives promise of their remaining in session during the summer.

THE DEAD LOCKS.

That there is serious disagreement between the two Houses on the appropriation bills is evident to the most careless observer. It is clear that there must be concession somewhere, or the Government will be entirely crippled at the end of the month for want of funds. If the Democrats of the House should adhere to their course substantially the Government will certainly be crippled in all its branches, and many most worthy persons will be turned out of employment. It remains to be seen what can be done in time to remedy this deplorable state of things. But it is likely that ten or fifteen days more will be frittered away on account of the all-absorbing interest in the political conventions which are to select candidates for the Presidential canvass during the present month. Many of the Republicans of both the Senate and House are now absent in Cincinnati, and in a few days more many of the Democrats will be absent on a similar errand in St. Louis. There is little likelihood of much besides being accomplished until the nominees on both tickets have been selected, and the struggle for the next Presidency is fairly launched. Congress has still much to do before it can with any propriety adjourn. Meanwhile the business of the country is in a fearful stagnation, while the financial question finds no solution.

MISSISSIPPI.

The Senate committee of five to investigate the last election in Mississippi departed for that State on Tuesday, June 6. They will make as thorough work as possible, but the date of their return is wholly in uncertainty. The discussion on this subject in the earlier part of the session disclosed an extent of violence and fraud in that distracted State which is scarcely paralleled by any other in the Union. The Senate is doing what it can to find out and apply the proper remedy.

SENATOR BARNUM.

The latest accession to the Senate is the Hon. Mr. Barnum, a Democrat, from the State of Connecticut. The political changes in both branches of Congress have been very marked, and there is all the more reason why there should be no mistake now made by the Republican party throughout the country, that their majority in the legislative branch of the Government as well as the incumbent of the Executive may be confirmed. The contest will be severe and close. May the Power that rules our destinies avert all these calamities, and prosper then as it enters on the second great century of its history!

THE NOMINATIONS.

On Friday, the 16th of June, the Republican Convention at Cincinnati nominated Governor Hayes, of Ohio, for President, and Mr. W. A. Wheeler, of New York, for Vice President. So the ticket is fairly launched, and now it remains to see that this ticket is elected.

SPEAKER KERR'S VINDICATION.—Speaker Kerr has been vindicated by the unanimous vote of the House of Representatives. Every Republican voted in his favor on the general principle that a good record should outweigh even positive testimony from a doubtful source. The willingness of the Republicans to do justice to Speaker Kerr, should cause Democrats to blush for shame over their actions under similar circumstances. The witness Harney who testified that he paid Mr. Kerr money for a cadetship has a far better reputation than the average witnesses called upon to testify against Republican officials. Weight has been given to men of no character by Democratic committees. Private reputation and long years of honorable service have passed for nothing in the partisan investigations set on foot by the Democrats of the House of Representatives. Bent upon securing political capital for the fall campaign, the usual sense of honor commonly recognized among fair-minded men has been totally ignored, and every perjurer who could be induced to appear as a witness has been regarded an oracle of truth. If the prompt vindication of Speaker Kerr by the Republicans of the House has the tendency to awaken a like sense of justice among the Democrats we may reasonably hope the period of official defamation is nearly at a close, and that a healthy public opinion will cause the shafts of malice and slander to fall harmless at the feet of men who have earned a right to public confidence by long and honorable service to the country.

OUR IMPORTS.—Our imports for the month of May fell $10,000,000 short of the imports for the same month last year, or a decline of at least thirty-three per cent. Our exports have about held their own. Business depression has led to the practice of economy, and this, if adhered to, must bring about prosperity.

REVIEW OF THE MONTH.

NATIONAL.

...In some respect the experiences of the past month may be truthfully regarded by the Democracy in the light which Tennyson places Waterloo when he sings of it as a "Day of onsets of despairs."

It has been a series of Waterloos. The Blaine business especially has been exceedingly damaging. For the purposes of this review the personal attitude and position of Mr. Blaine must be put aside. Admiration for his remarkable ability, vigor, audacity, knowledge of human nature, etc., cannot and must not be withheld. He has indeed "plucked the flower safety from the nettle danger" with consummate skill and force. This at least is true for his party, if not as wholly so for himself. In his remarkable defense Mr. Blaine proved himself able to bear whatever burdens of doubt his own letters might evoke, while, as if by lightning strokes, he showed the utter hollowness of Democratic pretensions. The manner in which Mr. Blaine handled his defense—if indeed it be not invidious to consider him in need of defense—shriveled his opponents into nothingness or worse, because it showed clearly that they were animated only by the wicked and unjust purpose of "making points." Mr. Knott, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, is placed in a very awkward position by his action in relation to the Caulfield cablegram. It looks very much as if he deliberately sought to suppress something favorable to an opponent, wrongfully accused.

...Putting aside, however, the theory of intentional suppression on the part of Mr. Procter Knott, what does his action show? This fact—that the Democrats are, as a rule, intensely provincial and bigoted in their action. The Republicans in the House can show at least two score of men who would have known that the Cable Telegraph Company never send the address of any patron other than city or country. A country lawyer—a provincial Congressman—and Procter Knott is both—to whom the receipt of a cable dispatch is an event, could not be expected to know the rules of a cosmopolitan office like that of the Cable Company, and was therefore just in the mood to suspect as bogus a dispatch marked "London," and nothing else. "Men of affairs," like Blaine, if they had been in any doubt would have gone or sent at once to the telegraph office and inquired. If necessary such a man would have sent to London and found out the "why and wherefore" of such an address. But "mousing" is a Democratic specialty just now, and men who otherwise regard themselves as gentlemen of honor do not appear to be in the slightest degree ashamed of acting as private detectives, while they eagerly rake the gutters over for tidbits of libel—provided only the same is likely to assoil a political opponent. It is the policy of negations, criticism, destruction. Small men, provincial patriots, are always meanly jealous of large reputations and the broad habits of continental life and character.

...Another illustration of the same spirit is seen in the inquiry into the Navy Department and Secretary Robeson's administration. The ex-Confederate managers of the cesspool committees do not appear to see how much their character as Americans is injured by the way in which they conduct their so-called investigations. But, then, they do not have a large degree of interest in the American name anyhow. The secret slander mill against Mr. Robeson seems to be coming to grief somewhat after the fashion by which that against Mr. Blaine has been put out of gear. The tenor of all these attacks is the same; the characteristics of each investigation are similar. In each one of them the Democrats proceed on the assumption, to all appearances, that every Republican public man must be assailed; that every one must be dishonored; that any story or hearsay, however loose, is testimony; and that any witness, however disreputable, who testifies to suit the majority, is to be relied upon.

...In refreshing contrast to all this is the manner in which Republicans have everywhere, and especially here at the capital, treated the accusations against Mr. Speaker

Kerr. No one who knows the facts will for a moment gainsay that when the report was first circulated that there was a general feeling of regret and incredulity—the latter being based on the Speaker's reputation and the former because of the scandal which such things bring on the good name of the Republic. There has been no gloating expression of pleasure at the besmirching of a political opponent, such as is constantly seen among Democrats when some new libel is uttered against a prominent Republican. The effect of all these things is very noticeable. The large number of good citizens who were some months since disposed to believe that there was an unwarrantable degree of corruption and loose dealing in Government and party circles here—induced to such belief by the reiterative abuse which has been so freely outpoured for four years past or more—are now satisfied that the Democracy are anxious only to secure materials for a campaign of slander and assuiling. The real issues they seek will not bear debate, and they know it. Hence they try to divert it into personal abuse. The American people are too intelligent to have this played upon them. And in their misapprehension of the average intelligence the Democrats again illustrate the narrow and provincial spirit by which they are controlled. The people will rebuke in a serious manner the spirit which wantonly slanders the men who saved the Union in order to give place and power to the men who sought its destruction.

...The triumph of Republicanism is not a question of mere party; it contains a deeper significance. It is an election between the broad, and humane issues on which it is founded and the narrow prejudices, the worn-out political dogmas of which the Democratic policy is the exponent. It is virtually an expression of a deliberate choice on the part of the American people between political life and political suicide. Its failure would be the political emasculation of a whole people.

If we have learned anything from the past it certainly should be to distrust those special doctrines which were intended but as temporary bridges, so to speak, to carry a perilous experiment over to safe ground.

One of those bridges Republicanism has already swept away into merited oblivion. To others the worst foes of the Republic—the advocates of an utter extinction of nationality, by the Procrustean doctrines of statesmen like Ben Hill of Georgia, Lamar of Mississippi, and Hunton of Virginia—still clinging with desperation as to the one true faith. These are the "Othellos" who would smother the "Desdemonas" of the Republic with the murderous pillow of State Rights. They cannot learn the lesson, simple as it is, that the whole is necessarily greater than any one of its parts, and they are willing to go on extending the influence and increasing the importance of segments with an irrational disregard of the unity of the whole. It does not occur to them that they are thus augmenting to a dangerous degree the power of each to harden the other. Take the petty States of any country so divided as an instance. Perpetually warring one upon the other, even the ostensible head is to some extent powerless to aid or control. There is no more positive certainty outside of the law of mathematics than that ungoverned, unregulated power invariably recoils on its own head. The turbulent South, with its mixed interests, is peculiarly liable to suffer in this way, and it is not difficult to foresee the Kilkenney-cat ending of the much-desired "united South" of the sanguine Democrat.

If we must go back a hundred years in this our Centennary, let it be with our eyes open to the perils we are incurring and the exceeding bitterness of the penance by which we must atone for our folly.

POLITICAL CONVENTIONS—REPUBLICAN.

...The Republican Convention called by the Spencer committee met at Montgomery, Ala., May 24. A Committee on Credentials was appointed after which the Convention adjourned. On the second day nominations were made of James Clarke, for Governor; T. T. Allington, Secretary of State; B. M. Long, Treasurer; G. P. Plowman, Auditor; R. I. Heflin, Attorney General, and P. J. Glover, Superintendent of Education. G. E. Spencer, Chas. Hayes, Alex. Curtis, and Alex. White were elected delegates at large. The sixteen district delegates were locally divided between white and colored citizens.

Resolutions favoring resumption, recognizing civil and political equality, free public and non-sectarian schools, protection and encouragement of labor were adopted; also, a resolution of hearty indorsement of President Grant. A resolution commending the Hon. O. P. Morton to the National Convention was made the subject of some amendments, but was finally adopted.

...May 24. The Kansas Republicans met at Topeka. Colonel W. H. Whitman was chosen as temporary chairman, and after recess P. B. Plumb was elected as permanent President. Although the delegation will go uninstructed the Blaine men were evidently in the majority. The delegates at large are T. C. Sears, A. M. Martindale, A. H. Horton, and T. A. Thatcher.

...The Republican State Convention of Nebraska assembled at Fremont May 23. Nothing was done and an adjournment was had to the following day, when little more than the election of chairman and delegates was accomplished. The former was General C. H. Stanwick, and the latter, R. G. Brown, N. R. Pinney, L. W. Osborn, H. S. Koley, C. F. Bayhoof, and A. Nance. The delegates were instructed in favor of Blaine. The two delegations from Douglas county were excluded, there being a contest between them and the committee then acting.

The Kentucky Republicans in convention at Louisville, May 18, indorsed Bristow as having been "true to Republican principles in war and peace, ever manly, calm, and courageous, and ever faithful in the discharge of his duty." A parallel between Lincoln and Bristow was also drawn. The following is their declaration of principles, which calls for—

First. For the fulfillment of all promises by the nation to soldiers and sailors who fought for the Union.

Second. Thorough retrenchment and the most rigid economy in all departments of the public service.

Third. Such reform in civil service as will prevent prostitution of public station to selfish ends, and make honesty and capacity indispensable qualifications for all offices.

Fourth. Favors men in office who are honest and have courage to fight corruption.

Fifth. Repudiation in all its forms is a national crime.

Sixth. The payment of the public indebtedness according to letter and spirit of contract.

Seventh. Speedy return to the money of the Constitution—gold and silver.

Eighth. Opposition to any postponement of return to specie payment beyond the time now fixed.

Ninth. Reduction of taxation as rapidly as the public faith permits.

Tenth. Opposition to all schemes which tend to place our public schools under other than popular control.

Eleventh. Equal rights before the law of all citizens.

Hon. James Speed, Attorney General under Lincoln's administration, was made President.

...The meeting of the Republican Convention of Missouri took place at Jefferson City May 24. Resolutions indorsing President Grant, and thanking him for his refusal to pardon convicted criminals, were read; others, in favor of Morton, Blaine, and Bristow, were referred. A resolution, declaring the feeling of the convention to be "for unity and harmony," of thankfulness for reforms, for sound currency of coin or convertible paper, and for a non-sectarian school system, was then adopted. The convention further presented resolutions arraigning the Democratic party for treasonable actions in the present House of Representatives. The delegates chosen were Benj. F. Loan, R. T. Van Horn, G. A. Finkelnberg, and James T. Smith, the latter a colored man.

...The Illinois Republicans met at Springfield, May 24. The Hon. Shelby McCullom was chosen for Governor; Hon. Andrew Sherman, of the Chicago Evening Journal, for Lieutenant Governor; Geo. H. Harlow, Secretary of State; Thomas B. Needles, State Auditor; E. S. Rutz, State Treasurer, and J. K. Edsall, the present incumbent, as Attorney General. The platform adopted denounced the policy of leniency toward ex-Confederates, and accused the party they represent of having caused the violent death of five thousand Unionists, white and colored, at the South, and calls on the Government to protect Union men. Laws to authorize the funding of national bonds into longer time bonds, bearing lower interest, were urged. The present currency was indorsed and a return to the State-bank system deprecated. Confidence was expressed in the President and the closest union among Republicans urged.

...In the Minnesota State Convention, assembled at St. Paul, May 24, the delegates were left uninstructed. Ex-Governor Ramsey, Lieutenant Governor Wakefield, W. H. Gale, and W. G. Ward were elected delegates at large. John T. Arms, Albert Knight, L. Bogen, R. B. Langdon, D. M. Sabin, and N. P. Clarke, as district delegates. The Presidential electors are ex-Governors Davis and Miller, General Edgerton, C. K. Tinseeh, and L. Bogen. Hard money and free school resolutions were unanimously adopted, followed by an emphatic condemnation of official dishonesty and an almost unanimous resolution indorsing Mr. Blaine.

...The Republican Convention of New Hampshire met at Concord May 24.

...May 31. The Louisiana Republicans convened at New Orleans, Judge Taylor Beattie in the chair. Resolutions were adopted favoring a return to specie payment, also asking for appropriations for internal improvements and aid for the Southern Pacific railroad and the improvement of the Mississippi. Governor W. P. Kellogg, S. B. Packard, P. B. S. Pinchback, and W. G. Brown were elected delegates. They go uninstructed.

...The Republican Convention of Iowa assembled at Des Moines May 31. Seven hundred and thirty-five delegates were present, constituting the largest convention ever held in the State. Hon. J. T. Wilson occupied the chair. The platform adopted called for unity and rigid economy in State and National affairs; favored a convertible currency; a continuation of the free school system; demanded the subjection of railways and other corporations to the Government, and invited immigration into the State. The State officers nominated were, Judge Sherman, State Auditor; Register Land Office, Captain Secor; Supreme Judge, Mr. Sevans; Secretary of State, Mr. Young; and J. T. McJunkin, Attorney General. The delegates at large were J. F. Winslow, Hiram Price, John G. Stone, and Geo. D. Perkins.

...The colored voters of New York held a committee meeting at Utica May 23, and pledged themselves to the support of Conkling.

DEMOCRATIC CONVENTIONS.

...June 1 the Democratic Convention of Missouri assembled at Jefferson City. The following platform was adopted:

1st. Fidelity to all the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

2d. Perpetual union of States, with local self-government in every section.

3d. Civil service reforms, and restitution of tests of honesty, fidelity, and capacity as qualifications for public office.

4th. Retrenchment and economy in Federal, State, and municipal administration. Lessening the burdens of labor by a reduction of offices and taxation.

5th. Exposure and speedy punishment by penal laws of corruption and speculation in the administration of public affairs.

6th. Private use and appropriation of public funds by State custodians means embezzlement and robbery. Official accountability exacted and enforced by better administration of civil and criminal laws.

7th. Free schools exempt from all sectarian control. A free press accountable for abuses to civil and criminal laws.

8th. The preservation of public faith and credit, and honest payment of the public debt.

9th. That we are in favor of the resumption act of January, 1875, but, inasmuch as the National Convention of the Democratic party is to be held within the next thirty days, we deem it inexpedient to adopt any resolutions respecting the currency or finances of the country, but refer the same to such convention, hereby pledging ourselves to support its platform, to give the electoral ticket of Missouri for the nominee.

The delegates chosen were Henry J. Spannhorst, Stilson Hutchins, Governor Charles H. Hardin, and ex-Governor Silas Woodson.

...The Alabama Democrats held convention May 31 and June 1, at Montgomery, W. H. Chandler presiding. Governor W. S. Houston was renominated for Governor; also, R. K. Boyd for Secretary of State, Daniel Crawford for Treasurer, Malo Brewer for Auditor, J. W. Sanford for Attorney General, and L. F. Box, Superintendent of Education, were put in nomination. J. L. Pugh and Jno. T. Morgan as electors at large, and E. S. Shorter, F. P. Walker, J. T. Morgan, and C. C. Laydon, delegates, were elected.

...The Virginia Democratic Convention met at Richmond May 31, Governor John L.

Marye in the chair. Delegates at large elected were General James A. Walker, Hon. Robert A. Cabill, Colonel D. G. Godwyn, and General Fitzhugh Lee: district delegates, C. E. St. Clair, B. F. Gunter, Wm. Lamb, J. B. Prince, Jno. A. Meredith, T. S. Flournoy, W. H. Sutherland, T. S. Boccock, Wm. P. Johnston, S. V. Southall, M. G. Harman, H. E. Peyton, M. S. Neal, Wm. Watts, and Wm. Astor: district electors, B. F. Bland, Thos. Tabb, A. M. Keely, E. K. Harris, E. Penn, Wm. M. Cabell, W. H. Riddlesbarger, B. J. Barbour, and D. S. Pierce: electors at large, Jno. H. Daniel and F. W. Holliday.

...The Tennessee Democrats convened at Nashville on May 31, John M. Crozier as presiding officer. Resolutions were adopted demanding unconditional repeal of resumption act and substitution of Treasury notes for national bank currency. Delegates at large chosen were J. A. Gardner, J. M. Fleming, ex-Governor John C. Brown, and Jno. C. Burch. They were instructed to act as a unit.

...California Democrats met in convention at San Francisco May 24.

...Maryland State Convention assembled in Baltimore May 31, Colonel John F. Dent president. Resolutions favoring specie currency were adopted. Hon. Robt. McLane, R. B. Carmichael, Hon. E. K. Wilson, and Outeridge Horsey were chosen delegates. They went unpledged, but the general sentiment was in favor of Bayard, of Delaware.

...The Democrats of Michigan met in convention at Detroit May 24 and 25, William L. Webber president, and Peter White, Terrill I. Mills, and Henry Schulberton were elected delegates at large. Resolutions repudiating undue exercise of power by Government officials, spoils of office, use of money to influence elections were adopted, and hard money indorsed as the only currency recognized by the Democratic party.

...Kansas Democracy assembled at Topeka May 16; instructed their delegates to vote for Hendricks.

...The Democratic State Convention of West Virginia met at Wheeling June 9, and nominated the following State ticket: Henry Matthews, Governor; Colonel White, Attorney General; Joseph S. Miller, Auditor; Thos. J. West, Treasurer; W. K. Pendleton, Superintendent of Education; and A. T. Haymond, L. C. Green, and O'Key Johnson, Judges of Supreme Court. Messrs. Camden, Wood, Davis, and Berkley were chosen delegates at large.

...The Vermont Democrats convened at Montpelier June 1, elected Marcus D. Gilman, R. B. Smalley, Jasper Rand, P. S. Benjamin, James S. Williams, J. W. Bliss, C. M. Chase, Thos. B. Kennedy, John Cain, and Geo. M. Fisk as delegates. They were instructed to act as a unit, and a strong indorsement of Governor Tilden was adopted. Resolutions calling for a reduction of Government officials, payment of the public debt, the maintenance of a free non-sectarian school system, and a currency of coin were passed. The convention was the largest assembled in the State since 1863.

...The Democratic State Convention of Minnesota assembled at St. Paul June 1. The session was an excited one. Resolutions indorsing Tilden and a return to hard money were adopted. The delegates elected were E. M. Wilson, Daniel Brick, J. H. McKinney, C. F. Brick, Michael Dorrin, J. T. Norrish, G. E. Skinner, Wm. Lee, J. N. Castle, and T. G. Mealy.

...May 23 the Democrats of New Jersey held convention at Trenton. They declared in favor of a specie currency, and presented the name of Joel Parker as their choice for President. Messrs. John P. Stockton, Leon Abbott, Miles Ross, and John McGregor were the delegates at large.

...The Democratic State (Greenback) Convention, meeting in New York city June 1, elected Richard Schell, Rutger B. Miller, Theodore Tomlinson, and Jeremiah Maguire delegates at large. Their resolutions claimed admission to the convention of the 27th as the only authorized representatives of the party and the only organization not controlled by pecuniary considerations. The delegates were urged to effect the repeal of the resumption act, and the substitution of legal tenders for national bank notes, and were further instructed to act as a unit.

INDEPENDENTS.

Hon. Peter Cooper has signified his acceptance of the Presidential nomination made at the Indianapolis Independent Convention May 18.

NOMINATIONS—RENOMINATIONS.

The Republican Convention of the Seventh Congressional district of Iowa has nominated Colonel J. B. Cummings for Congress.

In the General Assembly, held at Newport May 31, the Hon. Henry B. Anthony was nominated to the Senate from Rhode Island. As a testimonial of esteem and confidence, the nomination was made unanimous.

Hon. Wm. P. Frye, of Maine, has been renominated by the Republicans of his State.

EXECUTIVE AND DEPARTMENT DOINGS.

THE EXECUTIVE.

PRESIDENT'S PROCLAMATION.

The following proclamation was issued on Wednesday, May 25, 1876, by the President:

WHEREAS, A joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives was duly approved on the 13th day of March last, which resolution is as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it be, and is hereby recommended by the Senate and House of Representatives to the people of the several States that they assemble in their several counties or towns on the approaching centennial anniversary of our National Independence, and that they cause to have delivered on such day an historical sketch of said county or town, from its formation, and that a copy of said sketch may be filed, in print or manuscript, in the clerk's office in said county, and an additional copy, in print or manuscript, be filed in the office of the Librarian of Congress, to the intent that a complete record may thus be obtained of the progress of our institutions during the first centennial of their existence; and

WHEREAS, It is deemed proper that such accommodation be brought to the notice and knowledge of the people of the United States,

Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby declare and make known the same in the hope that the object of such resolution may meet with the approval of the people of the United States, and that proper steps may be taken to carry the same into effect.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, on the 25th day of May, in the year of our Lord 1876, and of the independence of the United States the one hundredth.

U. S. GRANT.

By the President,

HAMILTON FISH, Secretary of State.

PRICES FIXED BY AGREEMENT BETWEEN FOREIGN MANUFACTURERS TO BE CONSIDERED IN ESTIMATING VALUES OF IMPORTED MERCHANDISE.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, D. C., May 22, 1876.

To Collectors of Customs and others:

This Department is informed that, by convention or agreement between foreign manufacturers, prices of certain merchandise are fixed for sales to all foreign purchasers, except purchasers in the United States, and that invoices of such merchandise imported into the United States are valued at prices less than those so fixed.

In estimating the foreign market value of imported merchandise, appraisers will therefore take into consideration such agreements or conventions, as well as other evidence ordinarily considered by them, being careful to allow only such discounts, exhibited on the invoice, as are according to the usual and established usage of the trade, and to observe Article 446 of the General Regulations, which prescribes that discounts shall not be allowed when the invoice value will be reduced thereby below the foreign market value at the date of exportation.

B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary.

CONCERNING PAYMENT OF SEMI-ANNUAL DUTY, AND MAKING CORRECT RETURNS.

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, May 23, 1876.

Hereafter DRAFTS will not be received at this Office in payment of semi-annual duty. The amount must be deposited with the Treasurer U. S., an Assistant Treasurer, or a designated depositary, including any national bank designated as a Government depositary, and a certificate in triplicate obtained therefor, the "original" of which is to be sent to the Secretary of the Treasury, the "duplicate" to the Treasurer U. S., and the "triplicate" to be retained by the bank making the deposit.

In order to avoid unnecessary labor and annoyance in sending back semi-annual returns for correction, banks are urgently requested to examine and supervise their returns, to insure correctness, before sending them to this Office. It is also requested that there be more promptness in making the returns and payments within the time specified by law.

JNO. C. NEW,
Treasurer U. S.

CIRCULAR TO MARSHALS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
FIRST COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., June 7, 1876.

The attention of United States marshals is hereby directed to the following opinion of the Honorable S. F. Phillips, Acting Attorney General:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
WASHINGTON, May 29, 1876.

To the Secretary of the Treasury:

SIR: Yours of the 24th instant, addressed to the Attorney General, contains the following question of law:

Whether a marshal of the United States is entitled to full mileage on each writ served by him when several, issued in behalf of the Government, to be served on different persons, are or might be served at the same time, only one travel being necessary to make the service on all of said persons.

I have read the letter of the Comptroller inclosed by you, and considered the cases therein stated, in one of which a marshal "charges as for five separate trips of 125 miles each, to serve five subpoenas on witnesses for the United States in five cases of indictments, all the writs having been issued February 2, 1876, and all served from the 9th to 11th February, in Edmonson county, at or near the same place;" and in another of which another marshal "charges travel on each of ten warrants issued by a Commissioner at Clarkesville, on the 16th October, 1875, all served the next day by one deputy, nine of the writs being served 25 miles from Clarkesville, and the tenth 30 miles from that place. It appears that for one travel ten mileages are claimed."

Allowances for mileage to marshals, attorneys, and clerks are now regulated by the act of 22d February, 1875, (18 Stats., 334,) quoted by the Comptroller. This act provides that "no such officer or person shall become entitled to any allowance for mileage or travel not actually and necessarily performed under the provisions of existing law."

Under this act, in my opinion, there can be but one charge for mileage upon several writs, (subpoenas, &c.,) in hand at the same time, requiring a marshal to travel to the same place or in the same direction.

If a marshal have in hand several writs, (subpoenas, &c.,) against the same person or different persons living at A, he will charge mileage but once. If he have several writs, &c., against different persons living at either A, B, or C, which are (say) in the same direction, he will charge one mileage only to A, one mileage from A to B, and one mileage from B to C.

No matter how many precepts a marshal may have in his hands requiring him to go to the same place or in the same direction, he makes but one actual and necessary travel in serving them; for instance, in the second case above the marshal made one actual and nine constructive travels. The act of 1875 puts an end to the notion that the latter are performances for which the marshal is to be compensated.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
S. F. PHILLIPS,
Acting Attorney General.

The construction thus given to the law regulating mileage on judicial process is made the rule for adjusting accounts for travel. And marshals will conform to it in making up their accounts.

Travel should be made by the most direct routes, or such as are usually taken by business men going on their own affairs at their own expense. In vouchers containing charges of mileage the following particulars are required: The date of each writ; the name of officer issuing same; the date of service; the place of service. When the place of service is not a city, the name of the nearest post office, as well as the county, should be given; and if not in the immediate vicinity of said office, the distance and direction therefrom should be stated.

R. W. TAYLER,
Comptroller.

RESIGNATION OF ASSISTANT REGISTER OF THE TREASURY.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
WASHINGTON, D. C., June 9, 1876.

To Collectors of Customs:

The resignation of J. A. Graham, Assistant Register of the Treasury, having been accepted, to take effect on the 30th instant, the blank "Certificates of Registry," (Form 4, General Customs Regulations of 1874,) heretofore furnished by the Department, signed by him, will not be used after that date, and all blanks of said form, so signed, on hand (unused) in custom-houses on the 1st proximo will be returned to the Department by mail.

IMPROVING THE COIN.

The Director of the Mint has for some time past been arranging for an improvement in the devices on the coinage. The principal change will be the substitution of a classic head of Liberty in place of the sitting figure on the obverse of the silver coins. The best artistic skill that can be secured will be employed in effecting this and other improvements.

THE BOOKS AND ACCOUNTS OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT—THE ALLEGED DISCREPANCIES IN THE FINANCIAL REPORTS—EVERYTHING COMPLETE AND SATISFACTORY.

The report submitted June 6th by Mr. Sherman, in behalf of the Senate Finance Committee, concerning the books and accounts of the Treasury Department and alleged discrepancies or alterations therein, is extremely voluminous, embodying a large number of detailed letters and explanations furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, and containing or referring to numerous statements of accounts, &c., which are not susceptible of condensation and which would occupy many columns in print. The committee describe in detail the system of accountability provided by the statutes and say:—"So far as the safe keeping and custody of public money covered into the Treasury is concerned it would be difficult to point out a better mode than that provided for by the present law. Every safeguard that has been suggested has been furnished. No law can prevent the neglect or violation by comptrollers, auditors, or registers of their public duties; but the guards and checks upon such misconduct are as perfect as human ingenuity could devise. The only changes in these laws that the committee recommend are to authorize the Treasurer to be credited with unavailable sums charged to him, but lost, through no fault of his, by the robbery, &c., of his subordinates and of the United States depositories; and to provide for covering into the Treasury all 'trust funds' on which the interest alone is to be disbursed for the benefit of others, so that its expenditure may be under the general safeguard of the law, only to be paid out in pursuance of an appropriation by Congress." In this connection the committee refer to the sum of more than $28,000,000, which is charged against the Treasurer as being on deposit under the act of 1836 with the several States.

In regard to apparent discrepancies in the Treasury accounts the committee point out, among other things, that the Treasury account shows only the warrants paid, while the appropriation account shows all warrants issued.

It is further shown that the financial reports at different periods have been made up according to different systems of bookkeeping in various respects, and that the same is true as to the monthly debt statements. The detailed explanations of these apparent discrepancies that have been furnished to the committee by the Treasury Department are found complete and satisfactory, and no change is recommended in the existing system, which is declared to be the growth of the experience of the Department since its organization. In one of the letters which are embodied in the report Secretary Bristow says :

"In no instance has there been any erasure or alteration in the books or records of this Department, and the changes made in the published reports have been only to express with greater accuracy the precise condition of the public accounts as shown by such books and records."

CIRCULAR.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
June 10, 1876.

The following instructions are issued for the guidance of disbursing officers of the U. S. Navy :

In accounts rendered to this Office after the 1st of July, 1876, it is required that all payments for traveling expenses or advances shall be indorsed upon the copies of the orders, as well as upon the originals.

All vouchers for the above payments, substantiated by copies of orders from which the indorsements of payments have been omitted, will be suspended in the settlement of the accounts.

STEPHEN J. W. TABOR, Auditor.

Approved :

C. C. CARPENTER,
Second Comptroller.

EUROPEAN RAILWAYS.

Great Britain and Ireland had at the close of 1874, (Board of Trade Report,) 16,449 miles of railways. The cost was £37,078, or a total of about $3,000,000,000. It has one mile to every 5.1 square mile of superficial area, and one to about 2,000 inhabitants. The cost per capita for construction, etc., has been $90. The rate of interest was 4.49 per cent. The rate of profit was but 4.74 per cent.

Belgium had in 1871 about 1,956 miles of railway; 883 miles having been constructed by the State. The cost to the State had been $58,567,559. The average cost per mile on the total mileage was £13,281. In Belgium there is one mile to every 5.8 of square miles of area, and one to every 2,614 persons. In 1872 the profit was 8.1 per cent on the capital.

Germany, according to Dr. Sturmer, had in 1873, 14,077 miles of railway, being one mile to every 14.8 of area, and one to every 2,916 persons. The total cost has been about $1,373,609,700, or $30 per capita, (Dr. Sturmer.) The profit on outlay was 6.6 per cent.

France had in 1873, (February 1,) 11,050 miles open, 2,854 in process, and 773 of lines conceded and decreed, making a total of 14,667. The total cost was about $2,250,000,000. The cost per mile was about £30,746. Dividend in France has represented 10.74 per cent. on outlay. One-fifth of the cost of French railways so far constructed was contributed by the State.

Austria proper has 9,901 miles of railway, while South Austria and Upper Italy (Tyrol, Styria, etc.,) have 2,617, making in all 12,518 miles. The average cost has been £20,512, or a total of about $7,250,000,000. The profits were but 6 per cent., (1872.) It is now understood to have increased.

Russia had 10,140 miles, (in 1871,) part of which is in Asia. The cost an average per mile of £21,846, or a total of about $1,100,000,000.

Italy had (1873) a mileage of 4,202 miles; cost about the same as the German roads. Recently (1875) the Government has proposed the purchase of all the lines. It has largely aided in their construction and guarantees interest on the bonds.

Sweden and Norway had in 1874, 2,227 miles, a considerable portion of which is owned by the State.

Spain had at the same date, 3,801 miles, heavily mortgaged and poorly paying. (1870.)

The Netherlands report 1,042 miles. (1872.)

Portugal, 489 miles. (1872.)

Roumania, 507 miles. (European Turkey,) (1873.)

Denmark had in 1872, 530 miles of road.

The total mileage for Europe, according to the foregoing figures is 83,085. Probably five hundred miles of this total are to be found in Asiatic portions of the Russian and Turkish Empires. About one-sixth of this total is directly owned by the Governments of different States. The railway system is in all countries but Great Britain and the United States, more or less under State supervision.

THE REPUBLIC,

A Political Science Monthly Magazine.

THE REPUBLIC begins its sixth volume with the Centennial year.

It is in public favor, and has received substantial encouragement from every quarter in the Union.

Its promises have been made good. Its pages have been filled with political intelligence, with the suggestions of wisdom growing out of experience, with facts and figures arranged, making a fund of knowledge, of itself, a valuable text-book to all in Governmental affairs.

In the Presidential election, which takes place in 1876, the REPUBLIC desires to add to its usefulness by adding to its list of subscribers. It already numbers among its readers many of the most thoughtful and intelligent citizens of the country. The deep interest manifested by them in the work, is to the publishers, evidence of an appreciation of its value. If others would entertain of the REPUBLIC, could it be brought to their attention, will not our friends take upon themselves the slight labor of inviting others to add their names and their influence to a magazine that is published in the interest of the morality and good government.

As in the past, the REPUBLIC will advocate an honest administration of whether municipal, State or National.

It will advocate loyalty, honesty, economy, and personal ability as pre-requisites for office. It will give credit where credit is due; and impartial criticism whenever required.

It will hold up intelligence as the safeguard to National safety, and will defend our free-school system as essential to its preservation.

It will advocate improvements, that experience may commend, in the education of the young; but will oppose all efforts to divide the public-school funds, or to introduce into the schools sectarian influences.

It will advocate the perpetuation of the Republican party as the best, if not the only means to secure the preservation of the Union, and the impartial execution of the laws.

It will labor earnestly to bring about such reforms as the spirit of progress may demand, and in all things seek to present those methods of administration, which the wisdom and experience of a century have confirmed.

It will give to its readers a clear insight into the various branches of Government, by a faithful record of their doings.

These are among the leading features of the work to which the REPUBLIC is devoted. It pledges anew its best energies to make the Centennial volumes worthy the Nation it serves, and the year it enters upon.

To the Republican press of the country, co-laborers in the grand mission of preserving good government, the REPUBLIC sends greeting and thanks. If increased activity can merit a continuation of the good will expressed, our brethren of the press will still extend their hands in generous welcome. The Presidential campaign will bring upon all, increased responsibilities and new demands. The REPUBLIC will bear its share and perform its duty without fear or favor, keeping ever in view, that the highest reward that patriotism can win, is the consciousness that its efforts have advanced civilization and contributed to the cause of good government.

TERMS:

THE REPUBLIC is a magazine of sixty-four pages, published monthly, at $2 a year, or six copies for $10. The postage, in all cases, will be paid by the publishers. Address,

REPUBLIC PUBLISHING COMPANY, Washington, D. C.

To the readers of The Republic.

The Republic, now approaching the close of its third year, asks the attention of its patrons to the following Considerations-

1st, The publication is delivered to its readers at little more than its mechanical cost and postage.

2^d, The labor and thought bestowed on its pages have been uncompensated, having been freely given by earnest and intelligent and painstaking writers in the interest of truth and of progressive and improved methods of law and administration.

3^d, This labor of love in behalf of good government will be continued, but those engaged in the work ask that the field of usefulness may be extended to a larger number of readers.

4th, The publishers call attention to their premium list for clubs and further, especially request that each reader of The Republic will procure one additional subscriber, thus giving material aid in a work, the usefulness of which is already established.

To give this suggestion practical effect will be of great service to the cause in which we are engaged, and it may be accomplished with the expenditure of scarcely more than a moment of time.

Learned enthusiasts have defined Law as the perfection of common sense, and that the various amendments made thereto, to meet the altered condition of public affairs, show the advance of a people in culture and enterprise. But it is far more interesting to know that the most correct history of the rise and progress of a nation, exclusive of its wars, may be learned from the laws upon its statute-book. They disclose the popular character and disposition; the train of circumstances through which the nation had passed, and the events to which it led; the habits and manners of the people, and the distinctive public policy by which they have been guided. Laws refer to the numberless questions which have arisen, and which required settlement; to the protection extended to person and property; to the rights of individuals and communities; to the rights of trade and commerce; the adjustment of conflicting interests; the quality and nature of evidence; to the rules which regulate intercourse with other nations, and to maritime jurisdiction. Indeed, all the occupations in which men were engaged at home and abroad have been the subject of legal enactment; and those enactments commence from a period of comparative political infancy and weakness, and follow the intervening necessities and struggles, until to-day, when what was once feeble and immature, is developed into a glorious and mighty power, as one of the nations of the South.

The history of the Navigation Laws of Great Britain is of peculiar interest. It would seem that the first instincts of a nation, whose coasts are washed by the ocean, is to navigate the sea for the purposes of discovery or trade. Adventurers always abound ready for any enterprise, however hazardous. They are governed by two motives—a love of danger and the hope of reward. The wealth to be drawn from the deep requires only opportunity and labor. Newfoundland belonged to England, the waters of which teemed with fish. French and Spanish vessels fished off the coasts centuries ago, and cured the fish caught to be taken to those countries. Sabine, a writer well versed on subjects connected with Canada and its products, states that in Cabot's memoirs is a letter written by John Kent to Henry VIII. from St. John, Newfoundland, in 1527, reporting that he found "eleven men anchoring on the English coast, or interfering in waters where nets were used, were liable to seizure and confiscation. The Newfoundland fishery, meantime, was prosecuted with vigor. Three hundred and fifty to four hundred vessels, of various flags, are estimated to have been engaged in it. France and Spain had more ships in 1577 than England, because the English merchants are said to have sent their vessels to the old fishing grounds at Iceland. But English ships were the best; and Englishmen exhibited their national character. They gave protection to the fishermen of other countries, and exacted tribute or payment for the service. The whole commercial marine, Sabine says, consisted of only 1,232 vessels in 1582, of which 217 were upwards of eighty tons. If it is assumed that the fifty then visiting Newfoundland were of the latter class, then nearly one-quarter part of the navigation of England, suitable for distant voyages, was employed in fishing. In the year 1600, it is estimated that two hundred English ships went annually to Newfoundland, and that ten thousand men and boys were employed as catchers on board, and curers on shore. As the century advanced, there was a great increase of shipping and of mariners, which was attributed solely to the prosperity of the fishery. But of all the adventures at that period, the first direct voyage by an Englishman across the Atlantic was made by Bartholomew Gosnold to the coast of New England; and he had reason to be satisfied with the result of his enterprise. The celebrated John Smith, of Pocahontas fame, followed in 1614; and he, too, enriched himself. He took forty thousand fish, which he dried, and seven thousand which he corned or pickled, in the waters of Maine, and purchased a large quantity of furs from the natives. The profits of the voyage were upwards of seven thousand dollars. Of the prolific nature of the fish, and their abundance in the deep, some judgment may be formed from a record left by Richard Mather, who came over to Massachusetts in 1635. He kept a journal of the voyage, and when on the Bank of Newfoundland, writes that he saw, "on the end of it nearer to New England, mighty fishes rolling and tumbling in the waters, twice as long and big as an ox." He saw, too, "mighty whales spewing up water in the air, like the smoke of a chimney, and making the sea about them white and hoary, as is said in Job: of such incredible bigness, that I will never wonder that the body of Jonas could be in the belly of a whale." The wealth and prosperity of the corporations which had received royal grants, had the usual effect when higher influences were removed. Demoralization pervaded the Newfoundland colony, which led to many evils. Nor was pride wanting, and the assertion of restrictive powers. Robert Gorges bore a commission to proceed to New England as lieutenant-general over all the country known by that name; and Francis West was commissioned as Admiral of the Seas, with power to restrain such ships as came either to fish or trade on the coast without license. Both of these gentlemen visited this country in their official capacity; but neither of them was commissioned by the crown. They were only agents of a private corporation. Claims of this kind, of course, led to controversy. But a royal grant had been made of the vast domain embraced between the 40th and 45th degrees of north latitude, and extending from ocean to ocean. Forty noblemen, knights and gentlemen were named in this grant; and, assuming that the fishing-grounds, from Acadia to the Delaware, were no longer free to British subjects, they asserted exclusive property in and control over them; and they were sustained in their pretensions by the king. This company was known as the "Council of Plymouth." The council demanded that every fishing-vessel should pay into their treasury a sum equal to about 83 cents per ton, which, considering the size of the vessels, would be a tribute of more than $100 on each English ship. This action of the favorites of the Court, who had induced the king to bestow upon them such immense possessions, aroused the English people. They regarded the Dutch herring fishery as the "right arm of Holland," and dreamt of fortunes to be secured from a kindred pursuit in regions not reached by the Dutch. They wanted to fish at will—to draw the coveted treasures, without molestation or tribute, sails of Normans, and one Brittain, and two Portugall barks" in that harbor, but mentions no others; and he proposed to sail along the coast to "meete" the only vessel of his own flag known by him to be in that region. Subsequently a colony was planted, that fishermen might live permanently near the fishing grounds; and the colonists exterminated the red men, who formerly peopled Newfoundland. The intention was, that vessels should proceed at proper seasons from England to engage in the fishery. The fishery soon grew into national importance, and was considered worthy of legislative protection—not, it will be observed, so much in the way of guarding the labor of those hardy seamen, as in requiring Englishmen to consume the fish. Parliament passed an Act, in 1548, imposing severe penalties on persons eating flesh on fish-days. The punishment for the first offense was a fine of ten shillings, ten days imprisonment, and abstinence from meat during the same period; while, for the second offense, these inflictions were doubled. Provision, however, was made for the sick and aged, to whom flesh was necessary. They were exempted on obtaining a license from the ecclesiastical authorities, in which the names of the parties were inserted and the reason of the exemption given, viz., "for the better avoidinge of sicknesses and diseases which, by their absteining from flesh, might growe upon them."

Another Act of 1548, the first which related to America, had special reference to Newfoundland, and to the abuses that existed there. Its quaint preamble says: "Forasmuch as within these few yeeres now last past there have been levied, perceived, and taken by certain officers of the admiraltie, of such marchants and fishermen as have used and practiced the adventures and journeys into Iceland, Newfoundland, Ireland, and other places commodious for fishing and the getting of fish, in and upon the seas and otherwise, by way of marchants in those partees, divers great exactions, as summes of money, doles or shares of fish, and such other like things, to the great discouragement and hindrance of the same merchants and fishermen, and to no little damage of the whole commonwealth; and thereof, also, great complaints have bene made, and informations also, yerely to the King's Majesties Most Honorable Councell: for reformation whereof," etc., etc. From this period, in consequence of the measures adopted, the Newfoundland fishery became entirely free to every inhabitant of the realm.

At this time the whole foreign trade of England was limited to the Flemish towns and to the fishing grounds. With a view to extend commerce, and to encourage the fishing industry, another curious Act of Parliament was passed in 1563, which provided "that as well for the maintenance of shipping, the increase of fishermen and marines, and the repairing of the port towns, as for the sparing of the fresh victual of the realm, it shall not be lawful for any one to eat flesh on Wednesdays and Saturdays, unless under the forfeiture of £3 for each offense, excepting in case of sickness, and those of special licenses to be obtained." Sæter, from whom Saturday was named, was one of the old Saxon water deities, and is represented as standing on a fish with a bucket in his hand. The English Parliament was thoughtful of the people's spiritual welfare, as well as of the interests of trade; and lest the eating of fish on Wednesday and Saturday, as enacted, should have connected with it the idea of religious service, the Act, which was designed to increase shipping in the infancy of English navigation, provided further that "whoever shall, by preaching, teaching, writing, or by open speech, notify that any eating of fish or forbearing of flesh mentioned in this statute, is of any necessity for the saving of the soul of man, or that it is the service of God otherwise than as other politic laws are and be, then such persons shall be punished as spreaders of false news ought to be." And it may be remarked that there were laws which took their rise from the fisheries, which required British subjects to abstain from eating flesh and to eat fish on one hundred and fifty-three days in a year; so that the demand for the products of the sea was immense.

In the year 1571, British fishermen were permitted to export sea-fish free of customs duties; while, by another Act, foreign fishermen anchoring on the English coast, or interfering in waters where nets were used, were liable to seizure and confiscation. The Newfoundland fishery, meantime, was prosecuted with vigor. Three hundred and fifty to four hundred vessels, of various flags, are estimated to have been engaged in it. France and Spain had more ships in 1577 than England, because the English merchants are said to have sent their vessels to the old fishing grounds at Iceland. But English ships were the best; and Englishmen exhibited their national character. They gave protection to the fishermen of other countries, and exacted tribute or payment for the service. This action of the favorites of the Court, who had induced the king to bestow upon them such immense possessions, aroused the English people. They regarded the Dutch herring fishery as the "right arm of Holland," and dreamt of fortunes to be secured from a kindred pursuit in regions not reached by the Dutch. They wanted to fish at will—to draw the treasures, without molestation or from the coasts included in the limits of the patent. The controversy came up in the House of Commons, on the question of abrogating the obnoxious monopoly.

Bancroft has given a sketch of the debate. "What!" says Sir Edwin Sandys, "shall the English be debarred from the freedom of the fisheries—a privilege which the French and Dutch enjoy? It costs the kingdom nothing but labor; employs shipping; and furnishes the means of a lucrative commerce with Spain." The friends of free fishing prevailed; but that Parliament was dissolved before the proper legislation could be enacted. Another Parliament met, and the pretensions of the Council were again assailed. Sir Ferdinand Gorges, one of the Council, and who claimed to have acquired Maine in his own right, was summoned to attend the House. The Speaker, Sir Edward Coke, the great lawyer, demanded the revocation of the restriction; and, addressing Gorges from the Chair, said: "Your patent contains many particulars contrary to the laws, and privileges of the subject; it is a monopoly, and the ends of private gain are concealed under color of planting a colony." Coke afterwards took part in the debate. "Shall none," said he, "visit the sea-coast for fishing? This is to make a monopoly upon the seas, which wont to be free. If you alone are to pack and dry fish, you attempt a monopoly of the wind and sun." A bill was passed to revoke the charter, but it did not receive the royal assent. The Council, however, were thereafter powerless, although enjoying the King's protection; for public sentiment was against them, and they had to submit; and they continued to exist as a company only for the sale of lands. But the right of free fishing, thus gained, was of little real value, as it was complained that the fishermen began to leave fishing, and "to fall wholly to trading." The owners probably withdrew their vessels, because of the interruption of their adventures during the dispute; and many of them were interested in the fishing stages which had been set up by their countrymen in New Hampshire, Maine and Massachusetts.

The political consequences of the late discussions, which had involved a difference between the King and Parliament, were to be developed in the next reign. James I. bequeathed the quarrel to his son, Charles I.; and doubtless the disagreements between him and his people, which brought his head to the block, had their commencement with this subject, and the refusal of Parliament to grant him money. At the accession of James I., the royal navy consisted of but thirteen vessels, while the mercantile marine had largely increased. Charles succeeded to a naval force far too weak to cope with the fleets of his enemies. Embarrassed by the failure of the House of Commons to grant him supplies, he resorted to the levy of "ship money," in order to break up the Dutch fisheries on the British coast. This illegal method of raising money, though for a purpose to benefit England, only widened the breach between him and his people. The quarrel with Holland was of long standing. Complaints had been made in various reigns. In the time of James, the Dutch were said not only to have engrossed the fisheries, but the entire maritime business of the country; and the King compelled them to pay an annual tribute for the liberty of catching herring on the coasts of his kingdom. New complications arose. The Dutch were warned off by royal proclamation. Records show first occupancy of the fishing grounds by the English, and their dominion over the four seas which surrounded the British Isles, to the exclusion of both the French and Dutch. They also show that the Kings of England, even without the authority of Parliament, had levied large sums of money to maintain the sovereignty of these seas. The Dutch denied this, and, insisting that the dominion of England extended no further than the firths, bays and shores, continued their employment in British waters. A demand was made for the acknowledgment of the British title, and for tribute. Both were refused. Negotiations between the two nations ended in no adjustment. But Charles had annually increased his navy by the exaction of "ship money." And at last, a fleet of sixty sail was equipped, the greatest ever owned by England. This armament was sent to drive the Dutch from the four "narrow seas;" and the enterprise having succeeded, the Dutch were required to pay a sum of about $150,000. The value of the English fisheries, both at home and in America, is therefore apparent. The increase of shipping was encouraged. And Sabine says, that he regards it as historically correct to state that the earliest considerable demand for English ships of proper size and strength to perform long and perilous voyages was, for explorations and fishing upon our coasts. He is undoubtedly accurate in the statement. Yet something more needs to be added. England had taken long strides in civilization. Her people were learning the use of political power. The spirit of adventure possessed many, who made more distant voyages than to the fisheries. Wealth arising from trade was in the hands of a greater number of merchants, and the idea of employing that wealth with advantage in other commerce than the fisheries, was pressing itself upon them, and holding out visions too attractive to resist. But before they were to realize their hopes, England had to pass through an experience which, though apparently hurtful and disastrous, really prepared her for what was to follow. It consolidated the nation, and laid the foundation of her future greatness as a commercial and political power.

The civil war into which England was plunged by the illegal exaction of ship money, and the execution of Charles, devolved the government upon the shoulders of Oliver Cromwell. He set himself to work diligently, put down insurrection at home, in Scotland and Ireland, and made the name of England feared and respected abroad. Till the vigorous hand of Cromwell held the reins, she had been of little consequence in the councils of Europe. But at the head of an enthusiastic army, who went into battle with the certainty of victory from their strong Puritan faith, he advanced the fame of England higher than she had ever attained. His wars were meant to settle the dispute, and were, therefore, effective. The blow he struck, struck home, and discomfited the enemy. As a statesman Cromwell's tactics were unique—Cromwellian; and his style of attack was superb. He went forth to accomplish an object. When he left the field he returned with such evidences of success that neither side were disposed to doubt. The unfortunate monarch who lost his head, had managed to reign without Parliaments for many years. Parliament had not been summoned from 1629 to 1640, during which period he levied taxes without law. On the establishment of the Commonwealth the two Houses were convoked. And in 1652, the celebrated Navigation Act was passed, which changed the maritime condition of the world—the commencement of a series, the principle of which was adhered to, and affected the legislation of the United States.

Jenkinson, in his work on Treaties, gives a brief commentary on this original Navigation Act. He says: "Critics in commerce reason variously on the benefits or disadvantages of this Act. Those who argue in its disfavor, reason on the general principle of its being an error in politics to interrupt the free course of commerce by any kind of prohibitions whatever; which is generally true, and would be always so, could one be assured of constant universal amity. But as that is very far from being the case, the exception to the general rule in this case holds good, since nothing is more clear, than that those who employ most ships will have most seamen, and consequently be the best enabled to command the sea. It was but too evident by this short war (Cromwell's with Holland) how near a match for us (the English) the Dutch were, and continued so for some years after; and had not this act been made, would, very probably before this time, have been too potent for us, as they would have had the gross of the European seamen in their service; so that the act, notwithstanding some inconveniences it might produce in point of commerce, was a very happy thought in the making, and shows our judgment in its being continued."

Passing down to the commencement of the War for Independence, the question of the right to trade and fish by the revolted colonies was a very pressing one, which Lord North tried to answer by introducing in his place in the House of Commons, a motion to prevent the New England States from doing either. The motion was offered on the 10th of February, 1775; and was for leave to bring in a bill to restrain the trade and commerce of the Provinces of Massachusetts Bay, New Hampshire, the colonies of Connecticut, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, in North America, to Great Britain, Ireland, and British Islands in the West Indies, and to prohibit such provinces and colonies from carrying on any fishery, etc., etc. The motion was supported by Lord North on the ground that, as the Americans had refused to trade with England, it was but just that they should be deprived of the right to trade with any other nation. When the measure was brought in it was strongly opposed by Burke and other friends of the Colonies. Fox delivered his maiden speech against it, which gave promise of the talent he afterwards displayed. But the Government was strong, and some of its supporters were pleased to consider the bill as one simply of commercial regulation. It passed the House on the 8th of March, and was read a third time, on the 16th, in the House of Lords.

The Navigation Laws were upheld by the greatest statesmen of England, and were defended by every generation of political economists down to the time of Richard Cobden. Why those laws were regarded as so important, may be seen from the speech of Mr. Huskisson, once a Cabinet Minister, and a recognized authority on all questions relating to trade. He said: "Our Navigation Laws have a two-fold object: first, to create and maintain in this country a great commercial marine; secondly, an object not export their produce to England in British ships only, instead of employing the vessels of any third power." Such is the spirit and purpose of the Navigation Act of the Long Parliament, re-enacted in the first year of the Restoration, and which was in stringent operation in England till close upon the year 1850.

But a better idea, perhaps, may be gained of the navigation laws, and what they produced, from the following brief synopsis, which says a great deal in a small space: They secured to England the building of her ships, and their navigation by British seamen; the absolute monopoly of her Colonial commerce, and her full share of the carrying trade of the world. For these purposes, it was provided that no ship should be deemed a British ship that was not wholly built within the dominion of Great Britain, and wholly owned by British subjects, navigated by a British commander, and a crew of which at least three-fourths were British subjects; next, that only British ships should carry any merchandise from any port of the British empire to any other; and thirdly, that no goods which were the growth, product, or manufacture of Asia, Africa, or America, should be imported into any of the ports of Great Britain, except in British ships, or in ships of the countries of which the goods were the production. The rigorous execution of these laws, and the consequent adherence to these principles, are supposed by many to have done more than any other one in giving to Great Britain her enormous commerce. In order to ascertain what the British ships, and secure the execution of the laws, an admirable system of regulation was adopted, and remained in force in England during almost two centuries, with substantial change. But a change was finally made. In 1849 the principle of the law was permitted to break down slightly to some extent. By the act of 1849, and the subsequent amendments enacted that ships which are not of British build may become British by registration, wholly owned by British subjects, except that any ship may bring to the Kingdom any merchandise, except iron, however, that the King or Queen, by order in council, may interpose such changes, restrictions, or prohibitions upon ships of any country as will put the ships of that country, when in British ports, on the same footing as that on which British ships stand in the ports of that country. (App. Ency.)

In order fully to understand the reasons for the change in the navigation laws, it will be necessary to refer for a moment to the condition of England at the time. Cobden had instinctively perceived that as all human society must rest upon a material foundation, it was to the laws of material progress that inquiry must be first directed, and that before and beneath all systems of government, and all schemes of public morality, there must lie the science of the "wealth of nations." When the soil of a country is appropriated, the only means whereby an increasing population can limit the encroachments of the land-owners, is by working for foreign markets. Such a population has only its labor to give in exchange for its requirements, and if this labor is constantly increasing, while the produce of the soil is stationary, more labor will steadily and progressively be demanded for less of the earth's products. A fall of wages would, therefore, ensue, which, if caused by laws which kept up the price of English corn, while refusing admission to foreign corn to reduce the price of bread, he regarded as the greatest of crimes. Cobden looked upon the world as composed of a number of interdependent nations; and he desired, through commerce—not competitive, but co-operative commerce—to link them together in amity. He wished to advance the material prosperity of the world by the strong tie of common industrial interests. He would liberate trade from every charge save for the actual purposes of revenue, and throw open the world to all nations. The incentive to war would consequently be removed, the welfare of the people being bound up in the preservation of peace. Especially would that be the case in England, whose foreign commerce is the source of her wealth.

CHAPTER II.

THE PROGRESS OF THE REVOLUTION—FISHERIES—INDEPENDENCE—TREATY OF 1783—WAR OF 1812—SUFFERINGS AND LOSS IN NEW ENGLAND FISHING TOWNS—CONVENTIONS OF 1815 AND 1818—DIPLOMATIC STRUGGLES—WEARISOME NEGOTIATIONS—RETALIATORY LEGISLATION—ORDER IN COUNCIL—CLOSING OF THE PORTS TO VESSELS OF BOTH COUNTRIES.

The revolt of the Colonies of North America was a memorable struggle. Our revolutionary fathers stood steadily to their purpose; and were prepared to defend their right to the creation of a Power distinct and separate from the mother country. Such an event needed the sagacity of statesmanship, as well as courage and patriotism on the battle-field. And that sagacity was forthcoming in aid of the negotiators, always ready to advance the cause, even while the conflict was being waged.

Previous to the Revolution, the principles of the navigation laws had been applied to the Colonies. But when they became independent States, the time would arrive for the negotiation of a treaty with Great Britain. The records of Congress show that, on a proposition to open a negotiation for peace, Mr. Gerry introduced resolutions relating to the fisheries, on which there was much debate. The common rights of Americans to fish on the banks of Newfoundland, and the other fishing banks and seas of North America, were claimed. A violent opposition sprang up. It was said to be absurd to expect that a war, commenced for freedom, should be continued for the humble privilege of catching fish. Mr. Gerry replied: "It is not so much fishing, as enterprise, industry, employment. It is not fish merely which gentlemen sneer at; it is gold, the produce of that avocation. It is the employment of those who would otherwise be idle, the food of those who would otherwise be hungry, the wealth of those who would otherwise be poor,—that depend upon your putting these resolutions into the instructions to your minister." The resolution passed; and Mr. Adams was instructed "that the common right of fishing should in no case be given up." And they were not given up. In the third article of the treaty which was made,

But the career of the United States was attended with trials and struggles, with vast individual loss, while aiming to obtain a broader recognition of national rights. The prohibitory acts of 1808, the embargo, and other restrictive measures, which preceded the war of 1812, produced most disastrous results in New England. Ship building, which had been a considerable trade, had almost died out; the fisheries, as the nurseries of navigation and for the nurture of man, as Mr. Jefferson called them, were almost unproductive, and the ships of Americans were seized. Then came the war, with its negotiations and questions to be settled. During the negotiations at Ghent, John Adams, who was at Quincy, Mass., addressed a letter to President Madison, on the 28th of November, 1814, in which he said: "All that I can say is, that I would continue this war forever, rather than surrender one acre of our territory, one iota of the fisheries, (as established by the third article of the treaty of 1783), or one sailor impressed from any merchantship." * * "It is the decree of Providence, as I believe, that the nation must be purified in the furnace of affliction." Sentiments like these inspired the true course to be taken. Mr. Clay embodied in a proposition to the British commissioners the principle that we held our rights of fishing by the same tenure as we did our independence; that, unlike another class of treaties, the treaty of 1783 is to be regarded as perpetual, and of the nature of a deed, in which the fisheries are an appurtenant of the soil conveyed or parted with, and that, therefore, no stipulation was necessary or desirable to secure the perpetuity of the appendage, more than the territory itself. Out of these propositions grew the Commercial Convention, of July 8, 1815, which established a reciprocity of duties and charges of all kinds upon the vessels of Great Britain and the United States, in the ports of each nation. Its operation was, by its terms, to begin from the day of its date. The rule of reciprocity ought to have attached, practically, at that time; instead of which, each nation continued for a while to levy the duties existing before the convention, and England had not abolished them all in 1818. The commercial policy of the United States was made known by the act of March 3, 1815, and the principle set forth in that act was applied by the convention to the commerce between the United States and the British territories in Europe. But the convention, having excluded from its scope the trade between the United States and the British colonies in America, Great Britain had, in part, secured to herself all the benefits of the convention. She had obtained the relinquishment of our discriminating duties; but she, by her navigation laws, retained for herself, in the exclusion of the colonies from the arrangement of mutual commerce, all the advantage of the double and circuitous voyage from Great Britain to the colonies, from the colonies to the United States, and from the United States to Great Britain; and the disastrous effects of this were speedily felt by the commercial and navigatory interests of the United States. Mr. Richard Rush, who was sent to England as Minister of the United States, was charged with the important duty of representing this state of affairs to the British Government; and he was to ask them to apply a remedy. Mr. Rush reached London at the close of the year 1817, and entered at once upon his labors, even before he had been presented to George IV, then regent. From an interesting diary, kept by Mr. Rush, during his residence abroad, it appears that, at his first interview with Lord Castlereagh, that nobleman expressed his pleasure at hearing of the prosperity of the United States, remarking that the prosperity of one commercial nation contributed to that of others. At another opportunity, the subject of the Commercial Convention was discussed. Mr. Rush observed that, as neither country had carried out its terms, his Government desired to carry back the operation of the Convention to the day of its date, and was ready to give effect to this rule by retrospective measures, hoping to find a corresponding disposition in his Majesty's government. The partial opening of the West India trade, to the vessels of the United States, was also to be considered, and placed upon a satisfactory footing. The precise idea of the nature of this trade, according to the statement on the side of the United States, stands thus, as recorded in the diary. The United States contend for a free intercourse in their vessels with the British West India Islands, and British colonies on the continent of North America, whenever the trade is opened at all by Great Britain to their flag; else, they say, that, by navigation acts of their own, they will be obliged to prohibit the trade altogether. The steady policy of England has been to secure as large an employment as possible of her own tonnage, in carrying on her commerce with the rest of the world. Her celebrated navigation acts, commenced in Cromwell's time, and adhered to in principle ever since, whatever occasional departures there may have been from them in practice, have all had this end in view. They provided that the whole trade between England and the continents of Asia, Africa, and America, should be carried on in English ships, manned by English sailors. They also embraced regulations that placed the trade between England and the European nations upon nearly the same footing. It was against the previous monopoly of Dutch tonnage that these navigation acts were levelled. What more natural, than that other nations should be unwilling to witness the same monopoly in the tonnage of England, that she objected to in that of the Dutch; more especially, since the foreign and colonial dominions of England have swelled to an extent that could scarcely have been conceived in the time of Cromwell? The West India Islands being part of the British Empire, her right to interdict all trade between them and any foreign country, could not be denied, and was not. As a general rule, she did interdict it; but there were junctures when, to advance objects of her own, she would throw the trade open to the United States. When she did this, she confined it to her own ships, manned by her own sailors. What the United States claimed was, that, whenever the trade existed at all, it should be carried on in their vessels, manned by their sailors, as well as with the vessels and sailors of England. The trade once opened, the United States were parties to it; and thence urged their right to a voice in its regulation. This was their doctrine. It had been maintained since the days of President Washington. It contemplated no interference with the colonial rights or monopoly of Great Britain. It left her at full liberty to prohibit the importation into her colonies of whatever articles she thought fit, from the United States; and in like manner to prohibit exportations. It only asked the commercial intercourse, of whatever nation it might be, that was once opened for her benefit, or that of both countries, should be placed upon a footing of equality as to the vessels and sailors of both. This had been done in the trade between the United States and the European dominions of Britain, by the convention of July, 1815. That convention itself, unless the reciprocity were extended to the West Indies, would give undue advantages to British vessels. The latter could sail, under its enactments, from Liverpool to New York, for example, paying in New York, none other than American duties. Thence, under the English colonial system, they could sail to the English West Indies and back again to England, making profit from this three-fold operation. American vessels, on the other hand, were confined to the direct track between New York and Liverpool. The British ship could sail on the three sides of the triangle; the American only on one.

While Mr. Rush was holding communication with the British Government, in America, the Navigation Act, of the 18th of April, 1818, was passed. This act closed the ports of the United States against every British vessel, coming from any port or place in any British colony, or territory, which was, or might be, by the ordinary laws of navigation and trade, closed against vessels owned by citizens of the United States; and such British vessel, notwithstanding that, in the course of her voyage, she might have touched at, or cleared out from, any intermediate port or place in the British possessions, open to the vessels of the United States, was nevertheless to be excluded from the United States, provided she had cleared out, or sailed, from any closed British port, before touching at, or clearing out from, such intermediate open port; and every vessel violating, or attempting to violate, the act, was declared to be forfeited, together with her cargo, to the United States. And every British vessel, in any port of the United States, on board of which should have been there laden, for exportation, any articles of the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States, other than sea stores, necessary for the voyage, was required, under penalty of forfeiture of vessel and cargo, to give satisfactory security that the article so laden on board for exportation, should be landed at some place other than a place in any British colony, or territory, which, by the ordinary laws of navigation and trade, might happen to be closed against vessels of the United States.

Mr. Rush explained the reluctance with which the President had given his consent to that act, but said it was founded on equal justice; still his desire was to give efficacy to measures mutually more beneficial and conciliatory. To that end, the negotiation of a general treaty was proposed, which should include, among other matters, the question relating to the fisheries, which was of immediate and pressing importance. The negotiation proceeded, and the right and liberty, forever, was secured to American vessels, in common with British vessels, to fish on the coasts of Newfoundland, Labrador, &c., with the exception of the inshore fishing, within three miles from the land. But no article could be agreed upon as to the West India trade, because of the colonial system of Great Britain. Where, however, the colonial system of Spain interfered with English commerce, a very decided opinion was expressed, on behalf of England, by one who had a right to speak. The Spanish Ambassador represented to Cromwell, that the Inquisition and the colonial trade were his master's two eyes. Cromwell replied: "Then I must trouble your master to put out his two eyes." And words, from Cromwell, were not to be disregarded. But to return to the fisheries: It was said that New England, alone, was more populous than were the Dutch, when their sailors carried terror to the shores of the Medway, and as maritime; and that "her farms were upon the ocean, and she gathered her harvests from every sea."

As England continued to hold to her monopoly, the United States was forced to legislate against British vessels gaining any advantages from trade, while American vessels were excluded from her colonial ports. The act of May 15, 1820, closed the ports of the United States against British vessels coming by sea from any place in Lower Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, St. John's, Cape Breton, Bermuda, the Bahamas, the Caicos, or any of the dependencies of either of them, or from any other place in the possession of Great Britain, in the West Indies, or on the continent of America, south of the United States, under penalty of forfeiture of vessel and cargo. It also continued the prohibition concerning imports to the above-named places, in British bottoms. The British Government saw that England would not be permitted to engross all the commercial intercourse between the United States and her colonies, and certain of the colonial ports were opened to the admission of American vessels laden with certain articles of American produce. Congress reciprocated this concession, by the act of May 6, 1822, authorizing the President to proclaim the opening of our ports, upon terms of equal advantage. But the English concessions were very imperfect. American vessels were allowed to carry directly, and not otherwise, from some American port to the certain colonial ports which had been opened, and enormous duties were levied upon the articles they were permitted to carry, from which the cargoes of British vessels were exempt. And those vessels, moreover, could carry from the colony in North America to the colony in the West Indies, which American vessels could not. The inequalities under which American commerce labored, were so great and obvious, that the act of March 1, 1823, was passed. This act limited the intercourse with the United States in British vessels to the direct voyage. By the old Navigation Act, of the Commonwealth, no vessel of the United States could enter any of the enumerated ports of the British colonies, coming from any other part of the world; and the act of George IV, which relaxed the old Navigation Act, so as to open the enumerated ports to American vessels, admitted them only direct from the United States. No American vessel, so admitted to those ports, could export anything from them, because no other vessels were admitted. And it was impossible fully to apply the restrictions to British vessels which were applied to Americans. So the act forbade British vessels, coming from elsewhere, to bring with them merchandise from the enumerated ports; and those coming from the enumerated ports, to bring with them merchandise from elsewhere. Parliament met this enactment by a law which limited the liberty of trade to "the ships of those countries which, having colonial possessions, should grant the like privileges, of trading with those possessions, to British ships; or which, not having colonial possessions, should place the commerce and navigation of Great Britain, and of its possessions abroad, upon the footing of the most favored nation." The United States, having no colonial possessions, could not come within the first of these conditions; but it was expected to come under the second. It did not do so; and an Order in Council was issued, July 27, 1826, declaring that the United States had not complied with the conditions of the act of Parliament, and declaring that the trade and intercourse between the United States and the greater part of the British colonies should cease, on a day named. The President, on March 17, 1827, issued a proclamation, declaring that the trade between the United States and the British colonies be prohibited. And thus, said Mr. Cushing, by the official acts of both governments, the commercial intercourse between the United States and most of the British colonies in America, was suspended, and ceased. The value of the interests, brought to a stand still so suddenly, may be seen by the following figures, which show the gross registered tonnage, and the total amount of the imports and exports of both nations for the year 1826:

Statement of the Gross Registered Tonnage for the Year 1826: 737,978 tons.

NEBRASKA: ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.

All States are known by names other than their legal ones; hence, Nebraska was christened the "Antelope State." Yet its editors and citizens generally, in writing, denominate it the "Junior State." This they will abandon, however, next year, when Colorado will take her place as the "Junior" and "Centennial State." "Nebraska" is an Indian word, and was the original name of what is now called the "Platte" River. "Ne"—water; "Braska"—wide, shallow.

The territory forming the State of Nebraska, was included in the Louisiana purchase of 1803, and, until 1812, formed a part of the "District," or "Territory," of Louisiana, when it was embraced in "Missouri Territory." After the organization of Missouri, as a State, in 1821, Nebraska was without organization until 1844, when Senator Stephen A. Douglas, the "Little Giant," of Illinois, introduced a bill to establish the Territory of Nebraska, which was referred, amended, and finally lost sight of, until 1848, when the same Senator revived his bill, which was reported by the Committee on Territories, recommitted, and again slept until 1854, when its awakening aroused the entire Union. Congress then defined the territory of Nebraska. But in 1861, Colorado and Dakota were organized, and in 1863 Idaho, each taking a portion from Nebraska, reducing it to its present broad limits of 75,000 square miles, or the seventh largest State in the Union.

In March, 1860, the electors of Nebraska, by a vote of 1,877 to 1,987, declined forming a State government. In 1864, Congress, at the request of the Territorial legislature, passed an enabling act, which provided, among other things, that the Constitution of Nebraska should contain an article, forever irrevocable, without the consent of Congress—

1st. That slavery, or involuntary servitude, should be forever prohibited, in said State.

2d. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment should be secured, and no inhabitant of said State, to be ever molested, in person or property, on account of his or her mode of religious worship.

3d. That the people of the Territory should disclaim all right to the unappropriated public lands within its borders; that the lands of citizens of the United States, not residing within the State, should not be taxed higher than the land belonging to residents, and that the land, or property, of the United States should not be taxed.

Nothing definite was done, however, until June, 1866, when, by a vote of 3,938 to 3,838, the Constitution was ratified by the electors, and, in July of the same year, the first legislature of the State convened, at Omaha, the then Capital; but it was not until February 8, 1867, that Congress finally passed a bill admitting Nebraska. President Johnson having refused to sign, or veto, the bill adopted by Congress for that purpose, in July, 1866, and vetoed the one passed in January, 1867, and when the bill finally passed, it was over President Johnson's veto, by a Senate vote of 30 to 9, and in the House by a vote of 120 to 44. Johnson's professed objections were, that the bill embraced conditions not mentioned in the enabling act; that the proceedings attending the formation of the Constitution were different from those prescribed; and that the population did not, at that time, justify the admission of Nebraska. But it was generally understood that his real objection was the political character of the applicant.

The bill admitted the State into the Union, upon an equal footing with the original States, with the following express condition:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That this shall not take effect, except upon the fundamental condition, that, within the State of Nebraska, there shall be no denial of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person, by reason of race, or color, except Indians not taxed; and upon the further fundamental condition, that the legislature of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of said act.

Upon receipt of this, the President was required, by proclamation, to announce the fact; and from that time, without further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the State into the Union was to be considered as complete.

On the 20th of February, 1867, the Nebraska legislature ratified the above provision, and declared that said third section of act of Congress should be a part of the organic law of the State. On the 1st of March, 1867, the President announced, by proclamation, the compliance of Nebraska with the provisions aforesaid, and from that day dates her full admission into the Union.

There is, probably, no State in the Union which can show such material advantages, in such a short period, as Nebraska, from March, 1867, to the opening of the present year. Before us lies the valedictory message of Governor Robt. W. Furnas, delivered in January last, a masterly State paper, from which we glean, that at the close of the fiscal year, 1872, there were 538 school houses in the State, valued at $700,000; whereas, the report, for the fiscal year 1874, showed 1,345 school houses, valued at over $1,300,000, an increase of over 800 buildings and $600,000, in two years; while the increase in pupils, for the same period, was 21,868, there being at the close of 1874, 72,991.

Nebraska has, also, a State University, Agricultural College and Normal School, each and all in a flourishing condition, which speaks well for the educational spirit of the people of the "Antelope State."

Of State institutions, Nebraska has an Insane Asylum, Deaf and Dumb Asylum, and Penitentiary, and the last legislature provided for the erection of a Blind Asylum. And here it is proper to add, that the average number of convicts in the Penitentiary is 54. It is the only institution which does not thrive in proportion to the swelling population of the State.

The head waters and upper branches of the Missouri River are all in Nebraska. The soil is of exuberant fertility, and of a dark, vegetable mould, easily stirred and tilled. The altitude of the country secures to it a dry, pure, salubrious atmosphere, free from fog and humidity. The extreme of heat is 100°, tempered by prairie breezes—the extreme of cold is 15° and 20°, but the "zephyrs" of winter do not temper it much.

THE PRESENT.

We have briefly, and without effort to extenuate, set forth Nebraska as it was, from which it will be seen, that she was born after much travail and solicitude. And even after its birth, it had a seemingly insurmountable obstacle to overcome, in the fact, that the people of the world, through our geographers, were led to believe that the State was located in the centre of the "Great American Desert." But to-day, the three hundred thousand inhabitants of the State are witnesses of the great error thus circulated. And there are other witnesses also. We refer to those of the several States of the Union, who attended the two last National Pomological Exhibitions, holden at Richmond, Virginia, and Boston, Massachusetts, at each of which Nebraska carried away the largest and most envied premiums. The record will be required by many ere this is believed. Well, to prove it. On page 40 of the proceedings of the Convention and Exhibition holden at Richmond, Virginia, September 6, 7 and 8, 1871, we find the following record:

"From Nebraska State Horticultural Society, Nemaha county, Nebraska, R. W. Furnas, Secretary: 134 varieties of apples, 12 of seedling peaches, 10 of pears, 2 of plums, 1 of grapes. The collection of seedling peaches attracted marked attention. Fourteen years ago, not a single fruit tree, of any variety, was grown in Nebraska."

On page 42 we find the following:

"The Committee on Special Premiums for the best collection of apples, peaches, pears and grapes, report that the only entry meeting the requirements of this premium, is that from Nebraska, and respectfully recommend, that the premium of one hundred dollars, offered by the Virginia Pomological Society, be awarded accordingly."

"Colonel Furnas, of the Nebraska delegation, rose immediately after the reading of the report, and said: Nebraska did not send her fruits here to take premiums, and begged leave to donate the premiums awarded to the American Pomological Society. The donation was accepted, and three cheers given for Nebraska."

In the proceedings of the National Exhibition at Boston, Massachusetts, September 10, 11 and 12, 1873, we find that:

"Nebraska had on exhibition 229 varieties of apples, 43 of pears, 8 of grapes, 8 of peaches—total 288."

careful and thoughtful canvassing of judgment and opinion.

Elliott, reporter of the Convention which framed the Federal Constitution, tells us that whilst the last members were signing the Constitution, Dr. Franklin, looking toward the President's chair, at the back of which a rising sun happened to be painted, observed to a few members near him, that painters had found it difficult to distinguish in their art a rising from a setting sun. "I have," said he, "often and often, in the course of the session, and the vicissitudes of my hopes and fears as to its issues, looked at that behind the President, without being able to tell whether it was rising or setting; but now, at length, I have the happiness to know, that it is a rising and not a setting sun."

This nation did not spring into existence like Minerva, full-grown and developed. Only gourds and mushrooms grow in a night and perish as speedily; but the Fathers, with an eye single to the interests of those who should follow them, and animated with the hope and belief that the Sun of the Republic would not set until Time drifted and merged into eternity, provided us with a Constitution, which was at once a marvel of statesmanship, and stimulus to the higher and nobler aspirations of mankind. The people of the several States accepted it, and the news of its adoption was hailed with delight by millions beyond the seas, who looked upon America with the delight and confidence experienced by the "wise men" when following the Star of Bethlehem.

No people under the stars ever had so much to be proud of, ever inherited such a priceless legacy, as the Americans, and it is enough to crowd the mind with amazement, that there are to be found within our boundaries men who would, if they could, dissolve our relations as States and people, and upon the ruins of our grand Republic, establish small confederacies. Lincoln's question, in 1861, to the threatening rebels, was pertinent: "Can we not as friends make laws, better than as aliens we could make treaties?" asked the immortal martyr. What stands in the way of a consolidation of interests and unison of hopes?

Surely, nothing save the unbridled schemes of partizans, surcharged with passion and hate, and governed by the principle of "rule or ruin."

In 1861, power was legitimately and constitutionally withdrawn from the Democratic party and vested in the Republicans; whereupon the influential leaders of the Democracy set themselves about to tear down the pillars of the Republic, and through a sea of blood attain position, which they could not through the suffrages of electors. The Republican party resisted the fratricidal effort, and frustrated it, and has since used its best endeavors to so rehabilitate the insurrectionary States, that they should be enabled to work easily and contentedly under the same influences and laws that govern the loyal States. But, unfortunately for the country, there are those who look with disfavor upon all efforts looking to conciliation and harmony, and the effects of their teaching are fruitful of much discontent and mischief. Well may the patriot citizen exclaim, as did Hamilton, when commenting on the efforts of a similar class in his day to defeat the ratification of the Federal Constitution:

"The more I see, the more I find reason for those who love their country to weep over its blindness." To the lasting and enduring credit of Republicans let it be noted, that not a single one has put himself on record as opposed to extending the right hand of friendship and fellowship to their erring brethren, only requiring that no special privileges be granted those who fought against the Starry Banner, over those who periled their lives in its defence. On the contrary, they each say to the other, as Hamilton did to his friend, Col. Saunders: "We have fought side by side to make America free; let us, hand in hand, struggle to make her happy."

A more untenable doctrine than "State Rights" was never impressed as a hobby, and yet it is the staple upon which the enemies of the Republican party seek to regain lost power. In saying that it is untenable, is not indulging in mere assertion, but is easily demonstrated; and the effort is timely, inasmuch as the way to harmonious union is clogged by enemies of the Republican party, who insist upon a recognition of the dogma as a cardinal principle. The fact might be cited, that the question entered largely into the late war, and that the result was a verdict in favor of the doctrine that the Federal Government is superior to that of the State, as that of the State is superior to that of its counties. But history provides fuller evidence, and proves that the Fathers of the Republic, the framers of the Federal Constitution, repudiated the idea of State independence. Patrick Henry, in addressing the Convention of Virginia, called to consider the Constitution, said: "It has been repeatedly said here, that the great object of a National Government was National defence. If they give power to the National Government for the general defence, the means must be commensurate to the end. All the means in the possession of the people must be given to the Government, which is entrusted with the public defence."

Washington, under date of December 20, 1776, in a letter to the President of Congress, said: "I have labored ever since I have been in the service, to discourage all kinds of local attachments and distinctions of country, by denominating the whole by the greater name of AMERICAN."

Under date of November 30, 1787, writing in relation to the opposition to the Constitution by editors, on the ground of too much power being vested in the Federal Government, Washington said: "I have hardly seen one publication that is not addressed to the passions of the people, and obviously calculated to alarm their fears."

Madison, in his papers, vol. 1, page 89, says: "It has ever been my opinion, that Congress ought to have complete sovereignty in all but the mere municipal law of each State." The same statesman made a report to Congress in the following words: "It is understood and truly declared, in case any of the confederated States shall refuse or neglect to abide by the determination of Congress, and to observe all the articles of confederation, as required by the 13th Article, the said United States, in Congress assembled, are fully authorized to employ the force of the United States, as well by sea as by land, to compel such State or States to fulfill their federal engagements." Those words, uttered or written now, would stamp their author as a Republican of pronounced Radical type. But such were the sentiments of the Fathers, and such the convictions of Republicans of to-day.

There are other opponents of the Republican party, and its efforts looking to reconstruction, who argue, in their defense, that the enfranchisement of the blacks is an outrage, and being ashamed to acknowledge that their prejudice against the blacks as a race is the groundwork of their opposition, they assume to favor property qualification, reasoning, that thrift indicates intelligence, and naught but intelligence had just claims on suffrage. But why discriminate against the blacks? Why not make the principle, if a just one, general, and copy the suffrage law of Massachusetts? But this question of linking property qualification with suffrage was presented and ably argued in the Convention in which the Federal Constitution was drafted, and it is well to refer thereto and ascertain what were the views of the authors of that document, it being generally contended and conceded that they were wise and patriotic. Democrats usually wax very eloquent when alluding to the Fathers of the Republic, and the sacredness of the "Constitution as it was."

Franklin said, that if a vote were given a man who owned a jackass, and withheld from the man too poor to possess himself of such an animal, the question would be pertinent, "Was it the man or the jack that voted?"

Luther Martin was Attorney General of Maryland, and a delegate to the Constitutional Convention, in which body he was recognized as a very able member. In Elliott's Debates, vol. 1, p. 353, is recorded an address to the people of his State, by Mr. Martin, favoring the ratification of the Federal Constitution, of which the following is an extract:

"It was said that the maxim that taxation and representation ought to go together, was true so far, that no person ought to be taxed who is not represented; but not to the extent insisted upon, to wit: that the question of taxation and representation ought to be the same. On the contrary, the question of representation depends upon the quantum of freedom, and, therefore, all, whether individual States or individual men, who are equally free, have a right to equal representation; that to those who insist that he who pays the greatest share of taxes ought to have the greatest number of votes, it is a sufficient answer, to say: that this rule would be destructive of the liberty of the others, and would render them slaves to the more rich and wealthy; that if one man pays more taxes than another, it is because he has more wealth to be protected by Government, and he receives greater benefits from the Government; so, if one State pays more to the Federal Government, it is because, as a State, she enjoys greater blessings from it; she has more wealth protected by it, or a greater number of inhabitants whose rights are secured, and who share its advantages."

But it were useless to elucidate this question more elaborately. There is nothing but sound in the affirmative of the proposition, while the negative is pregnant with force and reason. Common honesty and fairness demand that the manhood of the blacks being recognized; that they should be awarded all the rights and privileges attaching to manhood; that the color of the skin should not debar a man from the polls, any more than should the color of eyes, or hair, or size of feet. The Republican watchword is, "Equal rights to all men."

But let us look reason, candor and honesty in the face, and ascertain, if possible, how true, genuine reconciliation can be brought about, and which of the political parties of the country and age is best calculated to perform the work.

And, first, let the inquiry be made as to how to commence the work? Republicans contend that it can only be consummated by commencing aright, viz.: by recognizing the equality of all men; by Americans becoming more homogeneous; by the mingling, on terms of amity, of Northern and Southern people, without odious distinction of section and inquiry as to color of blood, and nobility of ancestry. Through this commingling of the peoples of both sections of our Union, prejudices will be removed, and the "common brotherhood of man" be recognized; true chivalry will supersede the spurious article so long current; and instead of a man being considered noble because his father was noble or rich, he will be dependent, for character, upon himself; and instead of being held chivalric because of ancestry, wealth, or any other accidental and really extraneous cause, he only will be esteemed as chivalric whose heart reaches out in love and sympathy for mankind, whose hand is ever ready to aid and strengthen the unfortunate, and whose foot is never put forth to trip a fellow-being in the race for subsistence or honor. When this is done, and the life of the Northern man is as secure at the South, as that of the Southern man is at the North, Northern capital will flow into Southern channels, the smoke of factories will float in huge volumes over Southern cities, and the music of the forge, trip-hammer and cheery voices of industrious mechanics and artizans, will mingle with the atmosphere of sections now hedging in isolated peoples.

Such relations are desirable, on economic grounds. This Government was never ordained for the benefit of office-holders, and the more amicable and reciprocal the relations of our people, the less officials will be required under the Government, and those needed will receive less pay for their services. Then, instead of the National Government drawing upon the resources of its citizens, it would exercise only paternal care and protection. The experiment is easy and simple; the outgrowth and effect would cause rejoicing throughout the civilized world. Those who fought against the Union for four years, and, at Appomattox, accepted the issues of the war as final, and renewed their allegiance to the flag, must not be denounced as "scalawags," and those who exchanged Northern for Southern homes, with the view of pursuing honorable vocations of life, must not be stigmatized as "carpet-baggers." In a word, the blackest as well as the whitest, the humblest as well as most opulent citizen, must be protected in his right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." The Republican party secured to foreign-born citizens, who had voluntarily taken upon themselves the obligations of American citizenship, protection from hindrance, insult or injury, on re-visiting their native land, so that if an adopted citizen visits the country of his birth, and the authorities thereof claim him as their own, he has but to let his Minister know the fact, who will invoke the aid of the cable to transmit the intelligence to "the powers that be," here, when the full strength of the Government will be put forth to secure the personal liberty of such citizen. The Republican party insists that its native-born citizens receive equal protection under the shadow of the flag which is the emblem of our nationality.

Pages might be consumed in touching the picture, and making bolder its outlines; but suggestion sufficient to induce calm reflection is all that is aimed at, and the second proposition indicated is now arrived at.

What political party is best calculated to bring about the desired condition of things? Surely, not the Democracy. When power was last vested in the Democratic party, the National Treasury was full, and, on retiring, they passed over to their successors the keys to empty money boxes. When its last President set out from his Pennsylvania home, for Washington, to be inaugurated, his route was pleasant, and free from danger; but when Abraham Lincoln undertook the trip, it was in disguise, and under cover of darkness, to avoid assassination, in avoiding which he but postponed and finally met it. The country gave the Democracy one Government; it turned over to the Republicans two governments, each having a President. The country gave the Democracy one flag; it handed over to its successor two flags—the one our fathers gave us, draped in dishonor. The country gave the Democracy a suitable navy, and munitions of war; the Democracy scattered the navy, leaving our shores defenceless, and plundered our arsenals, leaving us without sufficient guns to arm two regiments of men. Worse than all, they gave to us, in lieu of the peace given them, a terrible, fearful war. On vacating their places of trust, as guardians of the Temple of Liberty, they set the Temple on fire, which fire the Republican party extinguished, with oceans of blood. During the conflagration, skeletons of heroes passed from prisons to trenches and laid in heaps as massacred and piled at Fort Pillow; infected clothing poisoned the atmosphere and caused the death of non-combatants; and every scheme which demoniac ingenuity could devise was brought into requisition. As well, therefore, might the angelic host have suggested the crowning of Lucifer "Son of the Morning," after his treason and fall, and the transfer of the trump from Gabriel to him, as for a man holding patriotic feelings towards his Government, to suggest that the reins of power be again reposed in Democratic hands. Those who so favor, would, had they lived in 1778, have advocated the sending across the briny chasm of a commission to Benedict Arnold as U. S. Minister to the Court of St. James. This is not a flaunting of the sanguinary linen, nor a shaking of the raw head and bloody bones, but words of truth and soberness.

Napoleon once said to his soldiers: "From the heights of yonder pyramids, forty centuries look down upon you." Republicans! from heights much greater and more dazzling than any which the pyramids of Egypt ever pierced, millions are looking down upon you. The Fathers of the Republic, the immortal Lincoln, and those who poured out, in red libations, their lives, that their country might live, are looking from out the windows of Heaven upon you. The cause they held so dear, while on earth, they have not forgotten, in their higher estate. Let the memory of their lives and sacrifices animate you to effort, and the consciousness of the purity of your cause nerve you to duty.

THE Republican party has not made, nor does it intend to make, war upon the Catholic Church. It holds, what many intelligent Catholics hold, that the Roman Catholic Church has no right to appropriate one dollar of the public school funds for the support of sectarian schools. It maintains the same doctrine toward all sects and creeds. The Roman Church has been the only one that claimed a division of the school funds. Opposition to this claim has brought about the issue between the Ultramontane branch of the Catholic Church and the Republican party. The Church has allied itself with the Democratic party to carry its point, and thus control a portion of the school money. The Republicans are a unit against the policy and the alliance. This is the whole question at issue.

RELATIONS OF THE STATE TO THE RAILWAY SYSTEM.

On the 25th of September last, an interesting celebration occurred at the town of Darlington, Durham, England, in honor of the semi-centennial of the opening of the first steam rail or tram-way. The biography by Samuel Smiles, of the Stephensons, father and son, gives an attractive account of the event :

"The railway, after being under construction for more than three years, was at length about to be opened. * * Opinions were pretty equally divided as to the railway, but as regarded the locomotive, the general belief was that it would 'never answer.' However, there the locomotive was—No. 1—delivered on to the line, and ready to draw the first train of wagons on the opening day.

"A great concourse of people assembled on the occasion. * * To give eclat to the opening, the directors of the company issued a programme of the proceedings, intimating the time at which the procession of wagons would pass certain points along the line. The proprietors assembled as early as six in the morning, at Brusselton fixed engine, where the working of the inclined planes was successfully rehearsed. A train of wagons, laden with corn and merchandise, was drawn up the western incline by the fixed engine, a length of 1,960 yards, in seven and a half minutes, and then lowered down the incline on the eastern side of the hill, 880 yards, in five minutes.

"At the foot of the incline the procession of vehicles was formed, consisting of the locomotive engine No. 1, driven by George Stephenson himself; after it, six wagons laden with coal and flour, then a covered coach, containing directors and proprietors, next, twenty-one coal wagons, fitted up for passengers, (with which they were crammed), and lastly, six more wagons laden with coal.

"Strange to say, a man on horseback, carrying a flag, with the motto of the company inscribed on it, Periculum privatum utilitas publica, headed the procession! * * It was not thought so dangerous a place after all. The locomotive was only supposed to be able to go at the rate of from four to six miles an hour, and an ordinary horse could easily keep ahead of that.

"Off started the procession, with the horseman at its head. A great concourse of people stood along the line. Many of them tried to accompany it by running, and some gentlemen on horseback galloped across the field to keep up with the train. The railway descending with a gentle incline towards Darlington, the rate of speed was consequently variable. At a favorable part of the road, Stephenson determined to try the speed of the engine, and he called upon the horseman to get out of the way! * * The speed was at once raised to twelve miles an hour, and at a favorable part of the road, to fifteen miles."

Dr. Smiles then tells how the runners and horsemen were distanced, and further, that on arrival at Darlington, it was found that the passengers numbered 450, and with the weight of merchandise, etc., that the train weighed ninety tons. The train returned to Stockton, twelve miles, occupying three hours in the journey. "The day was kept throughout the district as a holiday; and horses, gigs, carts, and other vehicles filled with people, stood along the railway, as well as crowds of persons on foot, waiting to see the train pass. The whole population of Stockton turned out to receive the procession, and after a walk through the streets, the inevitable dinner at the Town Hall wound up the day's proceedings."

This was the humble beginning of a system so vast at the fiftieth anniversary of the first opening of a tram-way operated by steam power, that the figures are almost startling. In fifty years, from the twelve miles embraced by the Stockton and Darlington Railway, with its three locomotives for freight and haulage, and its rude passenger coaches drawn by horses, there were in Great Britain and Ireland,* on the first of January, 1874, 16,082 miles of railroad; being one mile to every seven square miles of territory. On the same date, the United States operated 74,171 miles, or one mile to every 39 square miles of territory.

*Martin's Year Book for 1875.

According to the same authority, there was in each continental division, the following railroad mileage :

North and South America.

To recapitulate them, there was a total railroad mileage in the world, at the beginning of the year 1874, as follows :

MILES.

North and South America,	80,897.
Europe,	74,649.
Other quarters,	1,942.
	163,588.

Accurate data is not yet accessible for later constructions, but there is no doubt, that with the small branches running in Greece, the Channel Islands, Ceylon, Java, Japan, Singapore, and various other outlying points, as well as the additions made in the last twenty-one months to the mileage of the larger countries, that the present length exceeds 180,000 miles. It would be difficult to accurately estimate the capital invested, but it cannot be less, judging by the totals in the United States and Great Britain, than from fifteen or eighteen thousand million dollars. The total capital account for the United States was, at the close of 1873, $3,159,423,057 ; for Great Britain and Ireland, at the same date, £588,320,308, or about $2,941,601,540—probably $3,000,000,000 at this date. The capital of the French railroads is not less than $2,000,000,000, and that of Germany will be at least $2,500,000,000—making for these four countries, a total length of 113,826 miles, an aggregate of $10,601,034,597. The remaining sixty-seven thousand miles has cost, probably, three-fifths as much more, which would swell the total to about seventeen millions.

But the power of the railway system, in the countries where it is now of paramount importance, is by no means limited to what is embraced by the vast capital it represents. It is in its power to control the commerce of a country ; to develop its resources ; to strengthen its political unity ; to immediately and directly take toll of all production, and to very potently, though indirectly, shape the relations of legislation and administration, that this vast interest has become so formidable an element of modern life, affairs and government. It must be borne in mind, also, that the capital represented by the system, is practically concentrated into a very few hands. The number of those contributing by their means to the vast aggregate, cannot be large, when compared with the great number of those whose interests are to be affected by the lowering of a rate, or the dishonest management of any extended railway line. It may well be questioned, indeed, if the number of those investing in railroad stock, for instance, in a country like our own, forms, any way, as numerous a body as those who are employed in the conducting of the system itself.

On the other hand, the owners of stock or bonds, unless they are operators therein, or directly connected with the direction of the roads themselves, are the persons who practically know the least about the business. As railroads are now managed, they save little, provided only dividends are regularly paid. The actual managers of railroad interests, here or elsewhere, are very few in number. Probably, less than a thousand men may be said to control the vast mileage and capital which has been presented. Of that number, a smaller portion are the potential persons. In this country, a score of men might be named, whose word, if combined, would practically give the law to the seventy-five thousand miles of railroad, that binds, materially, the Continental Union into one. In England the number is somewhat larger. But everywhere the economic law is the same. Consolidation of the system by countries, or sections thereof; concentration of management leading to economy of administration and consequent greater profit, and finally to the death of all competition, unless the same be artificially enforced or produced by governed regulations. In fact, the fifty years of railway life just closed, establishes conclusively, that the system in private hands, is a remarkable proof of the possibility of an empire within an empire.

The benefits derived from the scientific highway, both to commerce and culture, cannot be denied. To do what John Ruskin desires, and blot them out, would be to plunge the social life of man into a chaos, which could end only in retrogression, or man's conquest of some new force, adapted to locomotion and traffic, which could fitly replace what would have been lost. But the question to be considered lies deeper. It is, what are to be the future relations of the railroad corporations to the Government, not only of this, but other countries? No thoughtful person can deny for a moment, the greatness of this influence, and the enormous power it wields; nor can it be denied also, that this power is largely irresponsible, either to the voice of the people, called public opinion, or to its trustees and attorneys—the Government of the State itself. Its position, also—that of a toll-gatherer—much more than that of a common carrier—is also to be considered.

Without offering any special plan of supervision, control, public ownership, or the worth while to enquire, what are the present relations of the railroad system to Government, or the State, in this and other countries? Premising, then, that there is no question among publicists, statesmen or administrators of this or other eras, identified with the inception and growth of any system of civilization, but that the community or State is primarily responsible for and sovereign over the highways of a country, and the authority for speaking of the railroad question as a matter of government polity, is easily understood and accepted. Lord Bacon speaks of the roads of a country as being its arteries; when the circulation is free, the general health is unimpaired.

Only two great nations have adopted, as a distinctive policy, the entire surrender, or practically so, of the construction, ownership, and, in a large and general sense, the complete control of their railroad systems, to private capital, interests, and management. These countries are the United States and Great Britain. Neither the General Government of this Union, nor the Imperial Administration of the Mother-Country, have as yet adopted the policy of State direction, supervision or ownership. In Great Britain, there is a direct inspection of the construction and permanent works, and a rigid code for the protection of life and property. But otherwise, the Government does not interfere with the management. Authority has to be obtained from Parliament to construct, and that body has required the companies to run cheap or "Parliamentary" trains, at stated intervals. Government has never laid out any general plan; it has given no subventions; it has, in fact, left railroad development to private demands and speculation, and given incorporations as prizes to the shrewdest lobbying.

In the United States, the State Governments have claimed and exercised the power of incorporation. A good deal of public money has been sunk in the form of subventions. Charters have been granted, as a rule, with reckless liberality. No authority has been exercised over location or construction, and not until very recently have any of the States attempted to exercise the regulative attributes of sovereignty, in relation to this system. Other attributes, such as the power of incorporation, and the exercise of the right of eminent domain, have been abundantly used for the benefit of these private companies. They have been so used, because the railroad is virtually "a public trust, charged with remuneration for private capital invested." They have not, however, been used in any large degree as a restraining or supervising force.

The National Government has given large subsidies, and owns great interests in railroads which have been constructed through the territories. These grants have been given and sustained on the largest grounds of public policy—political, military, material, commercial, and for what is so essential in a land like ours, for purposes of internal development. But all these grants are now regarded as being too lax in terms, and as retaining for Government itself, too little available power for the just subordination of such great enterprises to the public interests.

All the early discussions, as well as the more recent ones in Congress, State Legislatures, and Constitutional Conventions, show, that in the United States, as in the British Parliament, the railroad system was in its earlier inception regarded from the standpoint of public convenience, as being a matter of direct Governmental concern, to be regulated by it from the same point of view, that places the common highways of a country under communal control. It was regarded as a matter of purely administrative convenience, whether or not, the Government should construct the works itself; or transfer them, with appropriate privileges to private enterprise. The two great Anglo-Saxon nations decided on the latter. Both are now considering, seriously, whether they were or not, wise in that decision. At any rate, they have given it a large and ample trial. One result is the vastness of the mileage which has been constructed.

But the State—Belgium—which at the outset took the opposite view, and declared the construction of the scientific highways of a country to be properly the work of the Government itself, ranks, though small in area, as first among all nations in the proportionate extent of its mileage. In 1833, Belgium commenced its works of construction. The State laid out, built and now owns, the principal or trunk lines of communication. Up to 1844, it very sparingly encouraged private capital, in the construction of connecting and subsidiary roads. After the latter date, it became less rigid in its policy, and while still managing the chief lines, it allowed the corporation roads to grow rapidly, holding over them, however, the legal right to compel surrender by State purchase.

In 1860, private capital controlled 67 per cent. of the mileage, as against the Government trunk lines—forming 33 per cent. of the whole. Since this date, the private roads have become formidable competitors against the Government lines. Amalgamation, an inevitable consequence of railroad growth, has enabled powerful corporations to control the extension of their system. The Government competition is an excellent regulation, in, that it produces low and uniform rates, insures publicity, and does not allow of hasty construction. Since 1870, the State has resumed its original policy, and is now gradually absorbing the principal private roads.

France has adopted mixed principles. Up to 1842, the railroad system gained no marked foothold. At that date, the Government, to encourage private capital, divided France into six geographical divisions, and handed each over, for ninety-nine years, to a great corporation. A Government Department was established, and the whole system has been built up, and is now run under a system of rigid supervision. No interference with profit-making, beyond that of approving all changes in the tariff, either for freight or passengers, is attempted. The six original systems are known as the "Old Net-Work." To induce the construction of branch and connecting roads, a plan known as the "New Net-Work," was devised. A guarantee of interest for fifty years was given on certain amounts. The right of re-purchase, by the State, at the end of fifteen years, is also provided. Over one hundred million dollars has been so guaranteed. A Government director sits in all corporations. The leading principle is the absence of competition.

It is claimed that the State and the people are better served. Amalgamation is recognized. All tariffs are submitted to the Government, and then widely published.

In Germany, as now constituted, both private or corporate ownership, and that of the State, exists side by side, but all are under rigid military and administrative regulation and supervision. In Prussia, the Government is the sole or chief owner. In the other States of the Empire, roads have been built by Government subventions, in connection with, as well as by, private capital. The State, therefore, both owns and competes. The same principle that prevails in France and Belgium, of requiring publicity of all tariffs, is operative in all the German States, as well as generally throughout Europe. The effect is the same, everywhere—a decided tendency to producing uniformity of rates. The Government, as a competitor, finds itself, according to Belgian and German experience, always able to regulate, by reduction of rates. The difference of its position is so essential a factor in the problem, that it deserves to be made prominent. Capt. W. H. Tyler, R. E., the well known English Railway Inspector—an undisputed authority on all matters of theory and practice, in connection therewith—stated, in his evidence, taken by a joint committee of Parliament, in 1872, that the tendency of State management and ownership must be to promote the public convenience. That of corporate or private management must be to the making of profit. He also declared that, in his opinion, there were only two things to be done in the future: either to let the railways manage the State, or the State manage the railways.

To proceed with the present relations of Governments to this system. Russia owns all her railways. Their primary purpose is military and strategic—to facilitate the movement of troops, and enable the concentration thereof, for purposes of defence or attack. Of course, an immediate consequence of their construction, and the running of the same, is the large development of the country. Since the accession of the present Czar, private companies have been allowed to construct several important lines.

In the Empire of Austria-Hungary, the railways are under State supervision, but it is far less rigid than in the German Empire. The Austrian roads over the Noric, Carnic and Julian Alps, which are among the marvels of engineering, as well as offering to the traveller some of the most wondrous mountain scenery in the range of modern travel, were either built by the Government directly, or aided by large subventions. So with the roads that are now traversing the Hungarian and Slavonian provinces or States. The latter roads have been given to private corporations, supervised by the Imperial Government. The famous "Semmering" road, through Styria and Illyria, over the Noric Alps, to Trieste and the Adriatic, was formerly operated by the Government. It is now leased by a French company, for ninety-nine years. One of the conditions was, that the Government should never make any concession for a road from the lower Danube, through Hungary and Austrian Croatia, to Fiume, a famous Roman post and colony, on the Dalmatian shore of the Adriatic, not many miles from Trieste. This action is a grave blunder, and largely tends to promote Slavonian disaffection in the Austrian Empire. Besides, it greatly hinders the development of one of the finest wheat regions in Europe.

But to return to the question of railway management. As in Germany proper, all railroad employes are regarded as Government officers, and are under military discipline. In Prussia and elsewhere in Germany where its "blood and iron" rule prevails, the conductors and guards are all veteran soldiers, generally commissioned officers; while down through every grade the military discipline prevails. They form a special corps. So exact are the requirements, that when a train is passing, every switchman, watchman, guard at a water tank or gate, even the track-repairers and laborers, are obliged to assume the position of "attention," and make the military salute, as the locomotive and carriages go thundering by. This is done, because their superior officers are always presumed to be on board. It gives an American a singular feeling to look from the window of a flying express train, and catch a passing glimpse of a standing figure, rigid and stalwart, hand up to forehead, erect by some solitary gate or tank. In Austria, the same code prevails, but its enforcement is often so lax as to be a mere burlesque; as, for instance, when passing over some of the marvellous grades of the "Semmering," you look out and see a fat peasant woman standing by the gate or tank she and her husband attend, and holding, it may be, at a "present arms," a broomstick she has hastily picked up, on leaving the cottage to attend her post. Still, it must be confessed that the Austrian officials are much pleasanter to deal with than are the Prussians, especially for a stranger. The principal ones all speak French, and many of them English. They are decidedly courteous. The German railway employes as invariably speak French, and most of them English also, but they will not converse with you or answer inquiries, in either tongue. Only German is to be spoken, and this is according to orders. The Saxon officials are better than the Prussians, while the Bavarians—sometimes called the German Yankees—are even more obliging.

But this is aside. In Italy, Spain, and Portugal, the roads have been built, as a rule, by private corporations, largely aided by Government subventions. The State maintains a more or less strict control over the management. Military necessity enters largely into the conditions. In Italy, the railroad employé is a State official, in a limited sense. All changes in the tariff have to be approved by the Government, and publicity of all rates is required to be made. In Turkey, and its vassal States of Servia and Roumania, the necessities of their exchequers have been, and are, such as to require very liberal inducements for capitalists to enter on the work of construction. But, underlying all, the principle remains, of these works being considered of a public character and proper to be controlled by the State. In Egypt, the Khedive is the chief stockholder. In British India, private enterprise having failed to raise the capital needed, the Indian Government first determined on guaranteeing interest, which it has done, for ninety-nine years, at the rate of five per cent. From 1849, up to 1872, the amount thus guaranteed was £43,018,959, or about $215,094,795. Of this, however, $108,349,205 has been repaid out of the net earnings of the lines. The Government has a director in every board, and also reserved to itself the right to purchase the roads from the companies, at the end of twenty-five or fifty years, at the mean value of the shares for the three previous years, or of paying a proportionate annuity until the end of the ninety-nine years for which the guarantee is made; at which time the works, &c., will wholly revert to the Government. Since 1869, the Indian Government has adopted the policy of direct State ownership and construction. The vice-regal State has built since then, or has in process of construction, 1,415 miles of road. The only Japanese road, about thirty miles in length, is owned and maintained by the Mikado's Government. The roads in Australia, as well as on the American Continent, are under corporate control, in the main, though the Peruvian, Chilian, and Brazilian Governments have not abdicated their rights of sovereignty altogether, as is claimed to be the case in the great Anglo-Saxon communities.

All the leading nations are debating, with more or less earnestness, the question, What shall we do with the Railway Power? But the contest progresses more warmly and goes more deeply into the fundamental relations of government, as such, in the United States and in Great Britain, than elsewhere. Great organized materialities and wealth-making forces, like the railroad, telegraph, banking and insurance systems, are functions of modern life and activity, which stand in the attitude of the toll-gatherer, between producer and consumer, by virtue of offering facilities for transportation, exchange, intercommunication and prudential guarantees. They seem to present subject-matter for the closest consideration, in examining the conditions where private enterprise properly begins and ends, and where the government and community may properly execute, supervise, or wholly control.

In Great Britain, Parliament has several times undertaken a thorough examination of the railroad portion of this problem. It has solved that of the telegraph, by State purchase and working. In 1840, under the Premiership of Sir Robert Peel, a Joint Committee of Inquiry was appointed. A more important committee was appointed in 1844, under the chairmanship of Mr. Gladstone, which sat a long time, and made a thorough examination of the infantile giant. That committee had among its members, the ablest public men of the country. The report was drafted by Mr. Gladstone, and took broad ground as to the right of the State to control the great avenues of intercommunication and transportation. It confessed that English statesmanship has been in error in its early transfer of the railroad system to private enterprise. But, making this avowal, it also concluded that it was not desirable, at that date, to change the policy. A bill was presented, looking to the preservation of competition, and the regulation of amalgamation by providing—

"1. If, after 21 years, any new railway has made 10 per cent. for three years, Treasury may reduce rates, but are to guarantee 10 per cent. The revised rates and the guarantee to continue for 21 years.

"2. After 15 years, Treasury may buy any new railway for 25 years' purchase of the average annual profits for the preceding three years; but if the profits are less than 10 per cent., the amount to be settled by arbitration.

"3. No railway less than five miles in length to be bought; and no branch to be bought without buying whole railway.

"4. Recites that the policy of revision or purchase is not to be prejudged; and that 'public resources' are not to be employed to sustain undue competition with independent companies, and provides that no revision or purchase is of Parliament purchase, and me."

sary. A later Parliamentary Committee did much to draw public attention to the system as a matter of general concern. An Act was passed in 1847, appointing a "Railway Commission," consisting of five members, with many of the powers granted to the extinct Railway Board. This body ceased to exist in 1851. The revival of speculation in railway construction, led to the appointment of a new committee, of which Mr. Cardwell was made chairman. It was in session a long time, and made in all, five reports, the last one being very elaborate, especially as to amalgamation and interchange of traffic. The result was the passage of a law, known in Great Britain as the "Cardwell Act,"—a very important one; in that it establishes these principles: (1) that every company should be compelled to afford to the public, in respect both of goods and of passengers, the full advantage of convenient interchange from one system of railway to another; and (2) that every company should make equal charges under the same circumstances. This Act is regarded as faulty, in that the remedy, in case of infraction, lies in an appeal from the injured party to the Court of Common Pleas, and not to a special tribunal with ample powers to hear, and grant relief, in a more summary manner. All English legislation provides for "running powers;" that is, that every company or person should have the right to run through freight cars and trains, on any line, connecting or not with their own, under proper regulation. The same principle has been embodied in the legislation of several American States. As a fact, however, it has always been practically inoperative. The question of interest, alone, decides the "through rating."

The idea at the basis of the early legislation was, that the railway corporations would be chiefly owners of the permanent ways, and that they and all others could and would be common carriers over them. Great Britain has gone along without any more rigid policy—the discussion, in the meanwhile, increasing in interest. In 1865, a Royal Commission was appointed to make a more thorough inquiry into the management, condition and relations of the British railways to each other, the public and the State. The report of this Commission is very valuable for information but indeterminate as to policy. In 1872, a Joint Parliamentary Committee was again appointed, to inquire into a scheme of amalgamation, which was being urged by leading railroad men, and others, and by which it was proposed to divide Great Britain into about six districts, each, as in France, to be handed over to a separate corporation, amalgamated from those now operating the territory.

The report of this Committee is a very suggestive document. Inquiry was made into, not only the tendencies to amalgamation and non-competition, but, generally, the whole matter of management. The complaints made by those who were examined, are of a similar class to those presented so frequently at home, during the last five years. Discriminating rates, "ring" control, obstacles to through traffic, by or over other lines and corporations, the combination of lines supposed to be competing, and the absorption of the canal and other water routes. In a number of instances, also, the canals purchased by English railways have been closed.

But, to the general reader, the most interesting portion of the testimony relates to the opinions expressed by a number of prominent gentlemen, merchants, manufacturers, railroad directors and managers, engineers, and capitalists, identified with this interest, as to the proper relations that should exist between the State and the railway corporations; how far the matter of control or supervision should be carried; to what extent, if at all, the State should be interested in the ownership of railways; and as to the benefits or evils likely to arise from the direct public ownership thereof by the Government. It will surprise most Americans to learn, that not one among the several score of business men of great prominence, who were examined, doubted for a moment the right of the Imperial Government to become the owner of the entire system, or any part thereof. Some of them (not a majority) doubted the expediency of taking such action. There was not a dissident to the proposition, that it was not only the right, but the duty of Government, to institute a more immediate control over the railways than that now existing. The extent and nature of such power, as well as the methods to be employed, was, of course, a matter on which diverse opinions existed. A brief resume of the views expressed on these topics, by the leading witnesses, will be of value in this connection.

Mr. C. Clark, Chairman of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, testified at length as to the evils of which business men complained. But passing that portion by, and coming to the more general issues, Mr. Clark gave it as his opinion that the railway system was properly controllable by the Government or State; equal or equitable charges would, he believed, be among the earliest results. In response to a question, Mr. Clark expressed the opinion that Government ownership and management would be more economical than that of the present corporations. He instanced the Post-Office Department as an illustration of State efficiency and economy. In his judgment, the danger from political influence and patronage would not be nearly as great as is apprehended. The work requires special training, in all its branches, and the nature of the functions exercised by a railway department must separate it from such active political control as is now feared. The following questions and answers illustrate the sentiments expressed by Mr. Clark:

"Supposing that the State got the railways, how would you look for protection for facilities for goods?"

"We have seen the action of the State with regard to the Post-Office and telegraph system, and certainly from what I have seen, especially as to the telegraph department, I have no fear as to the Government providing proper facilities for the traffic.

"Supposing for a moment that the telegraph had remained in the hands of private companies, do not you think now that they would see that it is to their interest to give greatly extended facilities?"

"No doubt they might probably have seen that it is to their interest to have given extended facilities, but nothing to be compared to the facilities the Government have given us.

"Do you think the same reasons would apply in the case of railways?"

"Perhaps not quite so speedily, but as soon as the Government were able to organize their staff."

Mr. Clark added that, under State administration, economically executed, a great reduction of rates would follow, and the traffic would be enormously increased. He compared corporation control with that of the State. The latter would be most advantageous, because it would abolish wasteful rivalry, consolidate rolling stock, do away with large expenditures for buildings, centralizing the machine shops, etc. In his opinion, the management of great operations by a private firm, when practicable, was the most economical. Amalgamation must inevitably lead to State control.

Mr. J. Patterson, a leading commission merchant, of Liverpool, with several other persons from the same port, coincided with Mr. Clark's views. Lieut.-Col. Gambell, a wealthy iron manufacturer, of Helen, near Liverpool, was opposed to State ownership, but thought the Government should legislate for the relief of towns and persons, from unequal treatment by the companies.

Sir William Wright, President of the Hull Dock Company, a prominent capitalist, and a man of recognized administrative skill, gave his views at great length. He desired to see the State master of all the railways, under the direction of a department, the chief of which should sit in the Cabinet, as "Railmaster-General." The State should control on the same principle that it now does the postal and telegraph systems. He favored a large scheme of amalgamation, on the ground that it was better than the present system, and would, in the end, facilitate transfer to the State. As to the effect of State ownership, in the matter of influence, Sir Wm Wright declared that the present Parliamentary influence of the railways was much greater than it would be with State control. There was no serious objection to the chief being a party minister—the staff would be permanent. In his opinion, one town would not be favored over another for the operation by the State. Officials would not work less for the State; in fact, their positions being more secure, there would be more esprit. Shareholders have little influence under present conditions. They seldom know and cannot correct evils. A State railway official could not use his position any more wrongfully than one in the Postoffice. There are too many vigilant eyes on the watch. Competition is no safe-guard. The State, he said, in reply to a question, should work both for revenue and public benefit. The first is the chief, and usually the only aim of the corporate system. As to the purchase of the roads, it could be readily made. A valuation of the roads once effected, the shareholders could receive long time Government debentures or consols, instead of those of the railways they now hold. The Governments of Prussia, Russia and Switzerland are owners of their railway systems and work them profitably.

Mr. T. Wilson, a leading canal manager, favored the appointment of a Government Tribunal of Transportation and Inter-Communication. Mr. T. Pitts, Deputy Chairman of the Plymouth Chamber of Commerce, favored a plan of general amalgamation, with a Government Arbitration Board. Mr. J. Elliott, Civil Engineer, Southampton, opposed amalgamation because, if successful, it would make State control more difficult to obtain.

The views entertained by leading railway managers and directors must be of value in this connection. From a number of others, the following representative men have been selected: Mr. Boughton, General Manager of the Mid-Wales R. W.; Wm. Phillips Price, M. P., for Gloucester, and Chairman of the Midland Railway Company; Sir E. W. Watkins, well known in the United States as connected with the Erie Railway and its unfortunate English bondholders; Mr. H. S. Thompson, President of the Northeastern R. W. Company; and Mr. C. H. Parkes, for many years past the most prominent Parliamentary agent or attorney employed by the railway companies.

Mr. Boughton was emphatic in recommending the establishment of a Railway Tribunal, which should take cognizance of the tariff rates and fares, company disputes, the violation of "running powers," through-rating and carriages, with power to revise any rate or settle other grievances. He favored amalgamation on some general plan; thought all roads ought to have been constructed according to plans previously prepared by the Government; considers that money has been wasted because of the State's failure in this respect, and thinks a remedy can be found in the future by combining competition and State control. There should be a Government Department as well as Tribunal. It should embrace permanent and changeable membership, so as to have experience and progress combined. It should embrace legal and engineering talent with a representative of the administrative body or directory. The Minister should be responsible to Parliament, and annual reports should be made. Perhaps, appeals might lie to the Board of Trade from the Tribunal. He did not support State ownership, and favored the proposed amalgamation by districts. The companies would be few in number—an economic advantage. The Government should have the power to make the railways public highways to a certain extent.

Mr. Parkes also favored the establishment of a tribunal to revise rates and settle railway disputes. He thought the amalgamation of large companies was not economical. That of small companies was. It would be wise to hand over to large companies the management of all roads in any defined and related geographical section. The tendency is to State control.

Mr. W. P. Price, gave it as his opinion that the result of exclusive private enterprise and non-interference by the State, is confusion and chaos. One remedy is to reduce the number of administrations. This can only be done by the State. He thinks the difficulties of State control have been exaggerated. The rate question is the worst. Uniform rates are feasible only under State control. The present system is commercial in character, and run for purposes of profit-making. Mr. Price believed that one great difficulty to be encountered by the State would be in securing the services of proper persons. Statesmen and merchants are differently trained. That once secured, State control would not be difficult. He supported the establishment of a tribunal to which he would give great powers, because Parliament has parted with what he deems Imperial concerns,—the highways which belong to the whole country. It would prevent abuses and would not make serious blunders. A Government Director would be esteemed a spy in any corporate board. The object should be, not to punish the dividend—i. e., the stockholder—for misconduct, but the management—i. e., the directors. Such a tribunal ought to have the usual powers to punish persons for contempt. He believed general amalgamation would facilitate State control. It would be a process of absorption.

Sir E. W. Watkins desired Parliament to arrange and enforce "running," or through rates. All questions arising therefrom, and all other of an inter-road character, should be left for settlement by a railway tribunal. He regarded unconditional amalgamation as an evil; was opposed to direct control or ownership by the State. Competition could be maintained by a system of grouping. Parliament should refuse to amalgamate two roads going to the same important points, or amalgamating them, allow a third road to run over both, fixing either their own rates, or having them made by the railway tribunal. Such a court should have both government and corporation members. The latter should elect a majority, and the government appoint a minority. He would not object to its having a majority. Through rates should be fixed by joint arrangement between Parliament and companies. The court or board to settle working disputes, should have no power over issues between the citizen and companies. The public should have ample protection and recourse in some other court. As a citizen and politician, Sir E. W. Watkins said he was opposed to State purchase; as a railway shareholder, he favored it very much. It would make his property more valuable, by ensuring him fixed dividends. Shareholders would get a good price, and the State would take the whole risk. An extravagant price would certainly be paid. As to amalgamation, he believed it would make State purchase less possible. Only connecting lines, he thought, should have "running powers."

Mr. H. S. Thompson thought that public opinion was a great check to abuses, as in the case of the General Post-Office. Large companies were more economic. He did not regard competition as a competent factor. Compulsory "running powers" do not work well. Believed State ownership would be very bad, politically; not efficient in a commercial sense: Had never considered the probable effects to result from a State ownership of the permanent way, allowing all private parties to operate or run over them, under protective regulations. Had only looked at the question from the carrier point of view. The original idea was that certain companies should make the roadway, and the public should use them. It had never worked. Parliament can regulate.

The opinions of Capt. W. H. Tyler, R. E., carry with them great weight. All students and observers of the railway system consider him an authority, even when disagreeing with his conclusions. Capt. Tyler filed a valuable report with the committee and discussed, in extenso, the several questions before them. He believed the official publication of all tariffs would be desirable, as would also an effective system of "running powers" and interchange of traffic. To put such matters in operation, a tribunal would be necessary. The better such machinery worked, the less it would have to do. Competition must die a natural death. The larger systems work best, but they get wooden. The roads will amalgamate whether Parliament opposes or not. Capt. Tyler does not believe State control would provide uniformity of rates. This must be regulated to some extent on commercial principles, distance, etc. He would make the railway council, or department suggested, very independent in character. There would of course be a presiding cabinet minister, but his party feelings would be of little account in deciding any policy. The political head could not be held as responsible, as in other departments; his action would, of necessity, be so much restricted by the dependence in which he would be placed, as regards the permanent administrative council and staff. In the management, suggestions, and plans relating to termini, stations, fares, extensions, new lines, &c., would necessarily come from below, not from above. The decision would, undoubtedly, be made on the report of experts—men not likely to be influenced by party affiliations. The process would be from line officials through district councils, to the general council, then through the executive committee, to the Cabinet minister. Besides, Parliamentary inquiry and reports would be operative checks. The State could so reduce rates and extend facilities as to enable Great Britain, says Capt. Tyler, to successfully compete with all other countries. The indefinite extension of her commerce that could result, would be the greatest advantage to be gained. He was decided in expressing the opinion that the political influence of one great, or several large, railway companies, was greater and more detrimental than what would follow the Government system. The question of patronage is not a dangerous one. Railway work is hard work in all its branches. Men require to be trained thereto. They must go through the mill. Only competent persons could safely be selected. He did not believe the Civil Service system would work in connection with railways. Competition might possibly work as between grades and classes of employes, such as station-masters and book-keepers, &c., but not as between them and certain outsiders. Equal rates would be impracticable. He had considered, to some extent, the method of purchase, and thought it could be by bonds based on the security of the roads and their earnings—not on the general faith and security of the country. In buying the roads, the specific security to the corporate owners, should be the roads themselves.

These views are of importance, as it is safe to believe if the experiment is inaugurated by the British during Capt. Tyler's active life, that he will be made, as Mr. Scudamore was, at the transfer of the telegraphs, the organizing and executive chief of the new railway department.

With regard to the United States, the conditions are different. The discussion has not yet crystalized to anything like the extent it is seen to have done in Great Britain. A large majority of the States make no reference whatever to the subject matter of private "corporations," railroads or otherwise, or only provide that special laws shall not be made for their incorporation. These are Kentucky, Delaware, Connecticut, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Carolina, South Carolina, New York, Louisiana, Kansas, Nevada, Oregon, Alabama, Arkansas, Rhode Island, Indiana, Wisconsin, Virginia, Tennessee, Texas, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Minnesota, Michigan, California, Iowa, Maine, Vermont, Florida and Ohio. In the older States, except Maryland and Georgia, there are no provisions relating to this subject, except general declarations that monopolies are injurious to the people, and that private property must not be taken for use by corporations, etc., without compensation to be determined by a jury. In most of the "public land" States, their constitutions forbid the loaning of the State credit to works of internal improvements, banks, etc. In Louisiana, Mississippi and North Carolina, among others, provision is made for the use of such credit under stated conditions.

Of the other States, the Constitution of Georgia provides that the Legislature may grant private charters, and that the State may also make loans in aid of railroad construction, or build such road itself. The State is to have a first lien, except as to labor due and unpaid, on all the property interested.

Maryland, having largely aided the construction of both railways and canals, provides by the Constitution for a Board of Public Works, consisting of the Governor, State Comptroller and the Treasurer. This Board votes the stock owned by the State in the several corporations; all tolls and rates are to be submitted to its approval, and it also appoints the State Directors for each corporation. The State has parted with its stock and direct interest in the Baltimore and Ohio railway, and now controls only the Chesapeake and Ohio, the Delaware and Chesapeake, and the Susquehanna and Tide Water, Canals.

The remaining States have made, within a few years, (from 1870 down) stringent constitutional declarations of the power of the State to control and supervise the railroads within their own borders. Before, however, the tendency to exercise more or less positive powers over the transportation system had assumed this form, several States had partially exercised some of those general powers of sovereignty, which must, in the nature of things, apply to these corporations in their public character. New York, in 1855, appointed a Board of Commissioners. Its first report is one of the most valuable yet made on the subject. Laws have been passed fixing maximum rates for passenger traffic, and the corporations are required to make annual reports to the State Engineer. Pennsylvania has always required, for purposes of taxation, annual reports as to tonnage, receipts, etc., to be made to the State by the various railroads. Ohio provided, in 1867, for the appointment of a Commissioner to inspect roads as to their safety, investigate complaints, enforce the railroad laws, compel reports from the companies, and to make one annually. Under a law of 1873, Ohio also exercises the power to revise and limit rates. Massachusetts first appointed Commissioners in 1869, with general powers to inspect and report, which they do annually. They have no power to enforce decisions, but do act very much as a board of arbitration and conciliation might deem necessary and proper, by publishing them. New Hampshire, Connecticut and Vermont, have also appointed Commissioners with limited powers to examine roads, and to require and make reports.

Since 1870, under general powers, or derived from new and specific provisions, the States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, West Virginia and Nebraska, have appointed Commissioners or other officers, to enforce laws, more or less stringent, which have been adopted. The power to make, revise or regulate the rates of freight and travel, to require publicity of accounts, inspection of roads, &c., &c., is granted by the constitution and laws of the several States. Minnesota first appointed, in 1871, one Commissioner; in 1873, three were appointed. In Wisconsin and Illinois, the number is the same. In Nebraska, the incumbent is not yet named.

The character of recent constitutional requirements can be seen from the following summary of the railroad article in the new Constitution of Illinois, which is the first fruits of the Western agitation over the regulation of transportation companies. It requires :

First. That every railroad company doing business in the State shall maintain a public office within the limits of the State, where stock books and other important records shall be kept for public inspection.

Second. That "the rolling stock and other movable property belonging to any company shall be liable to execution and sale in the same manner as the private property of individuals."

Third. That "no railroad company shall consolidate its stock, property or franchises with any other railroad corporation using a parallel or competing line;" and in no case whatever, except upon public notice given, of at least sixty days, to all stockholders, in such manner as may be provided by law.

Fourth. That a majority of the directors of any railroad shall be citizens and residents of the State.

Fifth. That all railroads of the State shall be considered highways, and free to all persons for the transportation of their persons and property, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law; and "that the General Assembly shall, from time to time, pass laws establishing reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight on the different railroads of the State."

Sixth. That "no corporation shall issue any stock or bonds, except for money, labor or property actually received, and applied to the purposes for which such corporation was created;" that "all stock dividends and other fictitious increase of the capital stock or indebtedness of any such corporation shall be void;" and that "the capital stock of no road shall be increased for any purpose, except upon giving sixty days' notice in such manner as may be prescribed."

Seventh. That "the General Assembly shall pass laws to correct abuses and prevent unjust discrimination and extortion in the rates of freight and passenger tariffs on the different railroads in the State, and enforce such laws by adequate penalties to the extent, if necessary for that purpose, of forfeiture of property and franchises."

Eighth. That "the exercise of the right of eminent domain shall never be so construed as to prevent the taking, by the General Assembly, of the property and franchises of incorporated companies already organized, and subjecting them to the public necessity the same as of individuals;" and that the "right of trial by jury shall be held inviolate in all trials of claims for compensation, when, in the exercise of said right of eminent domain, any incorporated company shall be interested either for or against the exercise of such right."

The provisions of the West Virginia Constitution of 1872, are somewhat similar in form and spirit. They provide, however, that the Legislature may allow of the consolidation or leasing of roads whose character are indicated in the fourth section of the above. The new Constitution of Nebraska prohibits subscriptions by municipalities to railroads, but allows donations of money when sanctioned by a majority vote; confers on the Legislature large powers over railroad management; declares railroads to be public highways, and authorizes the establishment of maximum rates of freight and transportation.

The new Constitution of Pennsylvania contains stringent provisions relative to railroads and their incorporation. But these provisions are aimed at the corruption which has characterized legislative dealing with the corporations, and are designed chiefly to restrain in that direction. Charters are to be rigidly limited in provisions, and forfeitures are to be enforced. In this sense the most ample sovereignty is proclaimed. The railroads are defined as public highways, and their operators subject to the common law requirement of "reasonable" rates as "common carriers."

A new Constitution is pending in the State of Missouri, with every probability, at the present writing, of being adopted. It is in many respects a remarkable instrument; especially in the restraining character of many sections. As an effort to embody sovereignty over the franchises created by the States, without interfering with the administrative and business details thereof, it is doubtless the most pronounced effort yet made in the United States.

In the "Bill of Rights," sections are incorporated declaring that no private property can be taken for public use without compensation, to be ascertained by a jury or board of commissioners, and the section proceeds to declare "that whenever an attempt is made to take private property for a use alleged to be public, the question whether the contemplated use be really public, shall be a judicial question, and as such judicially determined, without regard to any legislative assertion that the use is public." It is also provided that the fee of land taken for railroad tracks, without consent of the owner thereof, shall remain in such owner, subject to the use for which it is taken.

The article on "corporations" provides as to "railroads" —

That it shall not be lawful to charge (except as to special excursion or commutation tickets) for freight or passengers a greater amount for the transportation of the same for a less distance than the amount charged for any greater distance, and suitable laws shall be passed to enforce this.

That any properly organized corporation shall have the right to construct roads from and to any point in the State, and to connect at the State line with other roads; also to "intersect, connect with, or cross any other railroad, and shall receive and transport each the other's passengers, tonnage and cars, loaded or empty, without delay or discrimination." That all railroads shall be considered public highways, and all companies "common carriers." That laws shall be passed establishing reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight, and the same may be enforced by adequate penalties.

The same provisions in substance that are embodied in the Illinois Constitution, relative to the State officers of operating railroads, public access to stock books, reports to State auditor, etc., are repeated in the new Missouri instrument. Also, to the liability of seizure of rolling stock for debt; non-consolidation of competing or parallel roads.

Other sections maintain State control over roads which, though incorporated originally by the State, have been sold or leased to a corporation in some other State; provide that no retrospective law for the benefit of a railroad or other corporation, shall be passed: that existing roads shall not benefit by future legislation, except on condition of accepting all constitutional provisions applicable to railroads.

Additional sections provide that no railroad director, officer, agent, or employé, shall be interested in any manner in the furnishing of materials and supplies, or in the business of a common carrier, either of freight or passengers, over the lines where-with they are connected. Discriminating charges are not to be made either to companies or individuals, by abatement or drawback, and penalties may be levied against all parties violating these provisions.

Elsewhere, in the legislative article, provisions are inserted, designed to materially restrict the operations of the railroad or corporation lobbies whose influence has been found so pernicious. The provisions prohibit the Legislature from giving, lending, or pledging, in any manner whatever, the credit of the State to any corporation, municipal or otherwise; to grant money or other thing of public value; or to authorize any municipal corporation to do any of the acts which itself is prohibited from doing, or to allow of the same becoming a stockholder in any road or other corporation, or association. It is also prohibited from subscribing, in the name of the State, to any such stock, except to secure loans heretofore made; it may not release, or alienate, or change the terms of any lien now held by any railroad; nor has it any power to release or extinguish any obligation or debt due the State by any corporation theretofore organized.

The Constitutional Convention in Alabama had before it, and finally adopted, an article on "corporations," the sections of which, in relation to railroads, declare that all such corporations are common carriers, and all roads and canals to be public highways. Authority for all corporations under general laws to construct roads in the State, to and from any competing points. The Legislature is directed to pass laws to correct abuses and prevent unjust discriminations. The issuing of free passes to members of the State Government or Legislature in any form is prohibited. Provisions are also embraced prohibiting the issuing of fictitious stock, or of any such evidences of indebtedness or capital, except for value received and labor done.

This summary completes the statement of the attitude assumed by the several States towards the railway system. It will be seen that they run the gamut of nearly every step short of the final ones—direct State supervision; direct control by State ownership. Massachusetts stands at one end of the first positive policy; and Missouri now seems to be at the other and affirmative terminus of the same course. The Railroad Commissioners of the first-named State seem to be united, judging by their reports and the more liberal utterance of their chairman, Charles François Adams, Jr., in the conviction that under present conditions, the best results can be obtained by such a board as their own, who occupy towards the public and the railroads a position somewhat similar to that filled by courts of conciliation, as they are now organized in England and some other countries for the settlement of disputes between labor and capital. Mr. Adams is very sure that in a State where the railroad stock is largely owned by resident investors, and the directory are therefore more or less controlled by the sentiment around them, that the creation and direction of public opinion by such a State Board, will in nearly every instance be sufficient to remove evils and settle disputes on the side of equity. He makes for this method the claim that it is more American and democratic than any policy of force, and points to the strange and new conditions which the railroad system necessarily creates, as requiring for the present, at least, a wise tentativeness in dealing therewith.

Next to the practical results of such a course as is pursued by the Massachusetts Commission—which Mr. Adams claims has worked effectively, in every instance—will follow the conclusions it has heretofore expressed, as to the ultimate consequences. The theory has been advanced, in their reports, that a “natural law of political evolution, governing transportation by rail, may now be formulated.” This theory assumes that the European practice, of control through State ownership, is the final result of “natural law.” To reach it, the following evolutionary phases are to be passed through:

1. Non-interference by Government, and the regulation of traffic by private competition and public demands.

2. The enforcement or regulation of competition, by legislative interference.

3. Placing the roads under complete Executive supervision, as, for instance, in France.

4. The partial ownership of roads by the State, and its consequent appearance as competitor and regulator, as in Belgium.

5. State ownership and management, as in Prussia.

The Wisconsin Railroad Commissioners* take exception to these conclusions, as not applicable to America. As they have had a marked experience, the views expressed are worthy recapitulation. Their general conclusions are:

That the public character of railways is fully established.

That the consequent right, and the necessity of control, are nowhere in doubt.

That control is demanded by the public interests, in the interests of capital, also, and that the necessity for control is a growing one.

The question of methods is then one of kind and degree. Early legislation has been inadequate; not sufficiently protecting the public; and it has been too special in its character. Remedial measures are needed; and, in the judgment of the Wisconsin Board, State ownership is wholly inapplicable. Competition may yet be preserved and maintained. Water routes may be made permanent, through but partial restraint. State supervision is as yet tentative in character, and should be more fully tested. The aim “should be to leave * * the largest freedom of action, compatible with a proper security of the public interests.”

Wholesome restraints may be enforced by general enactments that look to—

Regulating railway charges, by establishing a maximum limitation of rates, or by fixing one of profits. Cheap fares are regarded with favor, and the power to revise freight tariffs is deemed essential.

Opinion seems adverse to the limitation of profits, on the ground that it would lead to covering up of real profits, remove an incentive to economy, encourage the increase of capital stock, and that, in any event, such limitation would become, at last, a tax on productive industry.

A great advantage would be gained by requiring the publicity of all rates of freight; securing greater stability, uniformity in classification, and timely notice of changes. An interchange of traffic, and the prohibition of unjust discrimination, would be of great utility. The State may, also, properly require punctuality in the running of trains, rigid inspection of construction and operation, sharper police requirements, a uniform and public method of keeping railway accounts, full and more frequent reports, the publicity of contracts, and distinct limitations upon corporate powers, such as experience has, or may hereafter, determine to be necessary.

Having thus completed a review of the special position assumed by some of the States, and the more general attitude, borne by all, towards the railway system of the United States, it would not be proper to close this paper without some reference to the positions assumed in Congress, and the decisions made by the Supreme Court as to the Constitutional powers possessed by the General Government over the regulation of inter-State commerce, as well as postal and military communication between them.

The interpretation placed upon the power to regulate commerce between the States, as well as to establish postal and military roads, by the political school that advocates State Sovereignty, is well understood. As to first object, it is interpreted only to mean commerce in the sense of materials, not as to the means or methods of traffic and interchange. So far as it relates to means of commercial inter-communication and transportation, it is claimed as relating only to natural highways—the water courses and the vehicles employed thereon.

The Supreme Court has, however, given a much broader construction to the provisions under which control, as a matter of commerce, is claimed over the railways of the country.

In one of the earliest cases, (Gibbon vs. Ogden), Justice Marshall said: "Commerce as the word is used in the Constitution, is a unit, every part of which is indicated by the term."

Associate Justice Johnson said, in the same case, that: "In the advancement of society, labor, transportation, intelligence, care, and the various mediums of exchange, become commodities, and enter into commerce; the subject, the vehicle, the agent, and their various operations, become the objects of commercial regulation."

In another decision—that of the passenger cases—the Court said that commerce included "transporting the merchandise from the seller to the buyer, to gain the freight."

In the case of the United States vs. Combs, Mr. Justice Story affirmed, the power to regulate did not stop with the water. "It does not stop at the mere boundary line of a State, nor is it confined to acts done on the water, or in the necessary course of navigation thereof."

Chief Justice Taney decided, in another case, (Genessee Chief vs. Fitzhugh), that admiralty jurisdiction was not co-extensive with the power to regulate commerce, the latter being "as extensive upon land as upon water. The Constitution makes no distinction in that respect."

In the most recent case—that relating to the right of Pennsylvania to impose a tonnage tax on all freight passing over her railroads—which was brought into court by the Philadelphia and Reading railroad, the decision, as to the power of Congress, is most emphatic. The Court said: "Beyond a question, the transportation of freight, or of the subjects of commerce, for the purpose of exchange or sale, is a constituent of commerce itself."

In the Mississippi River Bridge case, at Clinton, Iowa, Mr. Justice Miller decided that:

"When roads become parts of the great highways of our Union, acting an important part in a commerce which embraces many States, * * * there can be no doubt that to regulate them, is to regulate commerce, both with foreign nations and among the States, and to refuse to do this, is a refusal to discharge one of the most important duties of the Federal Government."

Congress has, in limited degree, but quite logically and directly, acted in the line of the principles thus announced. It has passed a number of general acts, affecting railroads. The principal of these acts are chase and working. In 1840, under the Premiership of Sir Robert Peel, a Joint Committee of Inquiry was appointed. A more important committee was appointed in 1844, under the chairmanship of Mr. Gladstone, which sat a long time, and made a thorough examination of the infantile giant. That committee had among its members, the ablest public men of the country. The report was drafted by Mr. Gladstone, and took broad ground as to the right of the State to control the great avenues of intercommunication and transportation. It confessed that English statesmanship has been in error in its early transfer of the railroad system to private enterprise. But, making this avowal, it also concluded that it was not desirable, at that date, to change the policy. A bill was presented, looking to the preservation of competition, and the regulation of amalgamation by providing—

“1. If, after 21 years, any new railway has made 10 per cent. for three years, Treasury may reduce rates, but are to guarantee 10 per cent. The revised rates and the guarantee to continue for 21 years.

“2. After 15 years, Treasury may buy any new railway for 25 years’ purchase of the average annual profits for the preceding three years; but if the profits are less than 10 per cent., the amount to be settled by arbitration.

“3. No railway less than five miles in length to be bought; and no branch to be bought without buying whole railway.

“4. Recites that the policy of revision or purchase is not to be prejudged; and that ‘public resources’ are not to be employed to sustain undue competition with independent companies, and provides that no revision or purchase is to take place without an act of Parliament authorizing the guarantee or purchase, and determining how it is to be done.”

The report of 1844 also led to the creation of a Board, subordinate to the Board of Trade of the United Kingdom, whose duty it was to report upon new railway schemes and bills, with reference to their position and comparative advantage to the public, and especially with reference to questions of extension of lines, amalgamation and competition. This Board was, however, abolished in 1845 owing to the railway opposition, the Board of Trade being left to make such general regulations as it might deem necessary. A later Parliamentary Committee did much to draw public attention to the system as a matter of general concern. An Act was passed in 1847, appointing a “Railway Commission,” consisting of five members, with many of the powers granted to the extinct Railway Board. This body ceased to exist in 1851. The revival of speculation in railway construction, led to the appointment of a new committee, of which Mr. Cardwell was made chairman. It was in session a long time, and made in all, five reports, the last one being very elaborate, especially as to amalgamation and interchange of traffic. The result was the passage of a law, known in Great Britain as the “Cardwell Act,”—a very important one; in that it establishes these principles: (1) that every company should be compelled to afford to the public, in respect both of goods and of passengers, the full advantage of convenient interchange from one system of railway to another; and (2) that every company should make equal charges under the same circumstances. This Act is regarded as faulty, in that the remedy, in case of infraction, lies in an appeal from the injured party to the Court of Common Pleas, and not to a special tribunal with ample powers to hear, and grant relief, in a more summary manner. All English legislation provides for “running powers;” that is, that every company or person should have the right to run through freight cars and trains, on any line, connecting or not with their own, under proper regulation. The same principle has been embodied in the legislation of several American States. As a fact, however, it has always been practically inoperative. The question of interest, alone, decides the “through rating.”

The idea at the basis of the early legislation was, that the railway corporations would be chiefly owners of the permanent ways, and that they and all others could and would be common carriers over them. Great Britain has gone along without any more rigid policy—the discussion, in the meanwhile, increasing in interest. In 1865, a Royal Commission was appointed to make a more thorough inquiry into the management, condition and relations of the British railways to each other, the public and the State. The report of this Commission is very valuable for information but indeterminate as to policy. In 1872, a Joint Parliamentary Committee was again appointed, to inquire into a scheme of amalgamation, which was being urged by leading railroad men, and others, and by which it was proposed to divide Great Britain into about six districts, each, as in France, to be handed over to a separate corporation, amalgamated from those now operating the territory.

The report of this Committee is a very suggestive document. Inquiry was made into, not only the tendencies to amalgamation and non-competition, but, generally, the whole matter of management. The complaints made by those who were examined, are of a similar class to those presented so frequently at home, during the last five years. Discriminating rates, "ring" control, obstacles to through traffic, by or over other lines and corporations, the combination of lines supposed to be competing, and the absorption of the canal and other water routes. In a number of instances, also, the canals purchased by English railways have been closed.

But, to the general reader, the most interesting portion of the testimony relates to the opinions expressed by a number of prominent gentlemen, merchants, manufacturers, railroad directors and managers, engineers, and capitalists, identified with this interest, as to the proper relations that should exist between the State and the railway corporations; how far the matter of control or supervision should be carried; to what extent, if at all, the State should be interested in the ownership of railways; and as to the benefits or evils likely to arise from the direct public ownership thereof by the Government. It will surprise most Americans to learn, that not one among the several score of business men of great prominence, who were examined, doubted for a moment the right of the Imperial Government to become the owner of the entire system, or any part thereof. Some of them (not a majority) doubted the expediency of taking such action. There was not a dissentient to the proposition, that it was not only the right, but the duty of Government, to institute a more immediate control over the railways than that now existing. The extent and nature of such power, as well as the methods to be employed, was, of course, a matter on which diverse opinions existed. A brief resume of the views expressed on these topics, by the leading witnesses, will be of value in this connection.

Mr. C. Clark, Chairman of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, testified at length as to the evils of which business men complained. But passing that portion by, and coming to the more general issues, Mr. Clark gave it as his opinion that the railway system was properly controllable by the Government or State; equal or equitable charges would, he believed, be among the earliest results. In response to a question, Mr. Clark expressed the opinion that Government ownership and management would be more economical than that of the present corporations. He instanced the Post-Office Department as an illustration of State efficiency and economy. In his judgment, the danger from political influence and patronage would not be nearly as great as is apprehended. The work requires special training, in all its branches, and the nature of the functions exercised by a railway department must separate it from such active political control as is now feared. The following questions and answers illustrate the sentiments expressed by Mr. Clark:

"Supposing that the State got the railways, how would you look for protection for facilities for goods?"

"We have seen the action of the State with regard to the Post-Office and telegraph system, and certainly from what I have seen, especially as to the telegraph department, I have no fear as to the Government providing proper facilities for the traffic.

"Supposing for a moment that the telegraph had remained in the hands of private companies, do not you think now that they would see that it is to their interest to give greatly extended facilities?"

"No doubt they might probably have seen that it is to their interest to have given extended facilities, but nothing to be compared to the facilities the Government have given us.

"Do you think the same reasons would apply in the case of railways?"

"Perhaps not quite so speedily, but as soon as the Government were able to organize their staff."

Mr. Clark added that, under State administration, economically executed, a great reduction of rates would follow, and the traffic would be enormously increased. He compared corporation control with that of the State. The latter would be most advantageous, because it would abolish wasteful rivalry, consolidate rolling stock, do away with large expenditures for buildings, centralizing the machine shops, etc. In his opinion, the management of great operations by a private firm, when practicable, was the most economical. Amalgamation must inevitably lead to State control.

Mr. J. Patterson, a leading commission merchant, of Liverpool, with several other persons from the same port, coincided with Mr. Clark's views. Lieut.-Col. Gambell, a wealthy iron manufacturer, of Helen, near Liverpool, was opposed to State ownership, but thought the Government should legislate for the relief of towns and persons, from unequal treatment by the companies.

Sir William Wright, President of the Hull Dock Company, a prominent capitalist, and a man of recognized administrative skill, gave his views at great length. He desired to see the State master of all the railways, under the direction of a department, the chief of which should sit in the Cabinet, as "Railmaster-General." The State should control on the same principle that it now does the postal and telegraph systems. He favored a large scheme of amalgamation, on the ground that it was better than the present system, and would, in the end, facilitate transfer to the State. As to the effect of State ownership, in the matter of influence, Sir Wm. Wright declared that the present Parliamentary influence of the railways was much greater than it would be with State control. There was no serious objection to the chief being a party minister—the staff would be permanent. In his opinion, one town would not be favored over another for party reasons. Public opinion, in a representative government, has, in the end, always put down favoritism. The Prussian State roads are well worked. The system secures administrative efficiency and unity, and the economy is very great. The complexity of interest involved is no barrier to the operation by the State. Officials would not work less for the State; in fact, their positions being more secure, there would be more esprit. Shareholders have little influence under present conditions. They seldom know and cannot correct evils. A State railway official could not use his position any more wrongfully than one in the Postoffice. There are too many vigilant eyes on the watch. Competition is no safe-guard. The State, he said, in reply to a question, should work both for revenue and public benefit. The first is the chief, and usually the only aim of the corporate system. As to the purchase of the roads, it could be readily made. A valuation of the roads once effected, the shareholders could receive long time Government debentures or consols, instead of those of the railways they now hold. The Governments of Prussia, Russia and Switzerland are owners of their railway systems and work them profitably.

Mr. T. Wilson, a leading canal manager, favored the appointment of a Government Tribunal of Transportation and Inter-Communication. Mr. T. Pitts, Deputy Chairman of the Plymouth Chamber of Commerce, favored a plan of general amalgamation, with a Government Arbitration Board. Mr. J. Elliott, Civil Engineer, Southampton, opposed amalgamation because, if successful, it would make State control more difficult to obtain.

The views entertained by leading railway managers and directors must be of value in this connection. From a number of others, the following representative men have been selected: Mr. Boughton, General Manager of the Mid-Wales R. W.; Wm. Phillips Price, M. P., for Gloucester, and Chairman of the Midland Railway Company; Sir E. W. Watkins, well known in the United States as connected with the Erie Railway and its unfortunate English bondholders; Mr. H. S. Thompson, President of the Northeastern R. W. Company; and Mr. C. H. Parkes, for many years past the most prominent Parliamentary agent or attorney employed by the railway companies.

Mr. Boughton was emphatic in recommending the establishment of a Railway Tribunal, which should take cognizance of the tariff rates and fares, company disputes, the violation of "running powers," through-rating and carriages, with power to revise any rate or settle other grievances. He favored amalgamation on some general plan; thought all roads ought to have been constructed according to plans previously prepared by the Government; considers that money has been wasted because of the State's failure in this respect, and thinks a remedy can be found in the future by combining competition and State control. There should be a Government Department as well as Tribunal. It should embrace permanent and changeable membership, so as to have experience and progress combined. It should embrace legal and engineering talent with a representative of the administrative body or directory. The Minister should be responsible to Parliament, and annual reports should be made. Perhaps, appeals might lie to the Board of Trade from the Tribunal. He did not support State ownership, and favored the proposed amalgamation by districts. The companies would be few in number—an economic advantage. The Government should have the power to make the railways public highways to a certain extent.

Mr. Parkes also favored the establishment of a tribunal to revise rates and settle railway disputes. He thought the amalgamation of large companies was not economical. That of small companies was. It would be wise to hand over to large companies the management of all roads in any defined and related geographical section. The tendency is to State control.

Mr. W. P. Price, gave it as his opinion that the result of exclusive private enterprise and non-interference by the State, is confusion and chaos. One remedy is to reduce the number of administrations. This can only be done by the State. He thinks the difficulties of State control have been exaggerated. The rate question is the worst. Uniform rates are feasible only under State control. The present system is commercial in character, and run for purposes of profit-making. Mr. Price believed that one great difficulty to be encountered by the State would be in securing the services of proper persons. Statesmen and merchants are differently trained. That once secured, State control would not be difficult. He supported the establishment of a tribunal to which he would give great powers, because Parliament has parted with what he deems Imperial concerns,—the highways which belong to the whole country. It would prevent abuses and would not make serious blunders. A Government Director would be esteemed a spy in any corporate board. The object should be, not to punish the dividend—i. e., the stockholder—for misconduct, but the management—i. e., the directors. Such a tribunal ought to have the usual powers to punish persons for contempt. He believed general amalgamation would facilitate State control. It would be a process of absorption.

Sir E. W. Watkins desired Parliament to arrange and enforce "running," or through rates. All questions arising therefrom, and all other of an inter-road character, should be left for settlement by a railway tribunal. He regarded unconditional amalgamation as an evil; was opposed to direct control or ownership by the State. Competition could be maintained by a system of grouping. Parliament should refuse to amalgamate two roads going to the same important points, or amalgamating them, allow a third road to run over both, fixing either their own rates, or having them made by the railway tribunal. Such a court should have both government and corporation members. The latter should elect a majority, and the government appoint a minority. He would not object to its having a majority. Through rates should be fixed by joint arrangement between Parliament and companies. The court or board to settle working disputes, should have no power over issues between the citizen and companies. The public should have ample protection and recourse in some other court. As a citizen and politician, Sir E. W. Watkins said he was opposed to State purchase; as a railway shareholder, he favored it very much. It would make his property more valuable, by ensuring him fixed dividends. Shareholders would get a good price, and the State would take the whole risk. An extravagant price would certainly be paid. As to amalgamation, he believed it would make State purchase less possible. Only connecting lines, he thought, should have "running powers."

Mr. H. S. Thompson thought that public opinion was a great check to abuses, as in the case of the General Post-Office. Large companies were more economic. He did not regard competition as a competent factor. Compulsory "running powers" do not work well. Believed State ownership would be very bad, politically; not efficient in a commercial sense. Had never considered the probable effects to result from a State ownership of the permanent way, allowing all private parties to operate or run over them, under protective regulations. Had only looked at the question from the carrier point of view. The original idea was that certain companies should make the roadway, and the public should use them. It had never worked. Parliament can regulate.

The opinions of Capt. W. H. Tyler, R. E., carry with them great weight. All students and observers of the railway system consider him an authority, even when disagreeing with his conclusions. Capt. Tyler filed a valuable report with the committee and discussed, in extenso, the several questions before them. He believed the official publication of all tariffs would be desirable, as would also an effective system of "running powers" and interchange of traffic. To put such matters in operation, a tribunal would be necessary. The better such machinery worked, the less it would have to do. Competition must die a natural death. The larger systems work best, but they get wooden. The roads will amalgamate whether Parliament opposes or not. Capt. Tyler does not believe State control would provide uniformity of rates. This must be regulated to some extent on commercial principles, distance, etc. He would make the railway council, or department suggested, very independent in character. There would of course be a presiding cabinet minister, but his party feelings would be of little account in deciding any policy. The political head could not be held as responsible, as in other departments; his action would, of necessity, be so much restricted by the dependence in which he would be placed, as regards the permanent administrative council and staff. In the management, suggestions, and plans relating to termini, stations, fares, extensions, new lines, &c., would necessarily come from below, not from above. The decision would, undoubtedly, be made on the report of experts—men not likely to be influenced by party affiliations. The process would be from line officials through district councils, to the general council, then through the executive committee, to the Cabinet minister. Besides, Parliamentary inquiry and reports would be operative checks. The State could so reduce rates and extend facilities as to enable Great Britain, says Capt. Tyler, to successfully compete with all other countries. The indefinite extension of her commerce that could result, would be the greatest advantage to be gained. He was decided in expressing the opinion that the political influence of one great, or several large, railway companies, was greater and more detrimental than what would follow the Government system. The question of patronage is not a dangerous one. Railway work is hard work in all its branches. Men require to be trained thereto. They must go through the mill. Only competent persons could safely be selected. He did not believe the Civil Service system would work in connection with railways. Competition might possibly work as between grades and classes of employes, such as station-masters and book-keepers, &c., but not as between them and certain outsiders. Equal rates would be impracticable. He had considered, to some extent, the method of purchase, and thought it could be by bonds based on the security of the roads and their earnings—not on the general faith and security of the country. In buying the roads, the specific security to the corporate owners, should be the roads themselves.

These views are of importance, as it is safe to believe if the experiment is inaugurated by the British during Capt. Tyler's active life, that he will be made, as Mr. Scudamore was, at the transfer of the telegraphs, the organizing and executive chief of the new railway department.

With regard to the United States, the conditions are different. The discussion has not yet crystalized to anything like the extent it is seen to have done in Great Britain. A large majority of the States make no reference whatever to the subject matter of private "corporations," railroads or otherwise, or only provide that special laws shall not be made for their incorporation. These are Kentucky, Delaware, Connecticut, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Carolina, South Carolina, New York, Louisiana, Kansas, Nevada, Oregon, Alabama, Arkansas, Rhode Island, Indiana, Wisconsin, Virginia, Tennessee, Texas, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Minnesota, Michigan, California, Iowa, Maine, Vermont, Florida and Ohio. In the older States, except Maryland and Georgia, there are no provisions relating to this subject, except general declarations that monopolies are injurious to the people, and that private property must not be taken for use by corporations, etc., without compensation to be determined by a jury. In most of the "public land" States, their constitutions forbid the loaning of the State credit to works of internal improvements, banks, etc. In Louisiana, Mississippi and North Carolina, among others, provision is made for the use of such credit under stated conditions.

Of the other States, the Constitution of Georgia provides that the Legislature may grant private charters, and that the State may also make loans in aid of railroad construction, or build such road itself. The State is to have a first lien, except as to labor due and unpaid, on all the property interested.

Maryland, having largely aided the construction of both railways and canals, provides by the Constitution for a Board of Public Works, consisting of the Governor, State Comptroller and the Treasurer. This Board votes the stock owned by the State in the several corporations; all tolls and rates are to be submitted to its approval, and it also appoints the State Directors for each corporation. The State has parted with its stock and direct interest in the Baltimore and Ohio railway, and now controls only the Chesapeake and Ohio, the Delaware and Chesapeake, and the Susquehanna and Tide Water, Canals.

stitutional declarations of the power of the State to control and supervise the railroads within their own borders. Before, however, the tendency to exercise more or less positive powers over the transportation system had assumed this form, several States had partially exercised some of those general powers of sovereignty, which must, in the nature of things, apply to these corporations in their public character. New York, in 1855, appointed a Board of Commissioners. Its first report is one of the most valuable yet made on the subject. Laws have been passed fixing maximum rates for passenger traffic, and the corporations are required to make annual reports to the State Engineer. Pennsylvania has always required, for purposes of taxation, annual reports as to tonnage, receipts, etc., to be made to the State by the various railroads. Ohio provided, in 1867, for the appointment of a Commissioner to inspect roads as to their safety, investigate complaints, enforce the railroad laws, compel reports from the companies, and to make one annually. Under a law of 1873, Ohio also exercises the power to revise and limit rates. Massachusetts first appointed Commissioners in 1869, with general powers to inspect and report, which they do annually. They have no power to enforce decisions, but do act very much as a board of arbitration and conciliation might deem necessary and proper, by publishing them. New Hampshire, Connecticut and Vermont, have also appointed Commissioners with limited powers to examine roads, and to require and make reports.

Since 1870, under general powers, or derived from new and specific provisions, the States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, West Virginia and Nebraska, have appointed Commissioners or other officers, to enforce laws, more or less stringent, which have been adopted. The power to make, revise or regulate the rates of freight and travel, to require publicity of accounts, inspection of roads, &c., &c., is granted by the constitution and laws of the several States. Minnesota first appointed, in 1871, one Commissioner; in 1873, three were appointed. In Wisconsin and Illinois, the number is the same. In Nebraska, the incumbent is not yet named.

The character of recent constitutional requirements can be seen from the following summary of the railroad article in the new Constitution of Illinois, which is the first fruits of the Western agitation over the regulation of transportation companies. It requires.

First. That every railroad company doing business in the State shall maintain a public office within the limits of the State, where stock books and other important records shall be kept for public inspection.

Second. That "the rolling stock and other movable property belonging to any company shall be liable to execution and sale in the same manner as the private property of individuals."

Third. That "no railroad company shall consolidate its stock, property or franchises with any other railroad corporation using a parallel or competing line;" and in no case whatever, except upon public notice given, of at least sixty days, to all stockholders, in such manner as may be provided by law.

Fourth. That a majority of the directors of any railroad shall be citizens and residents of the State.

Fifth. That all railroads of the State shall be considered highways, and free to all persons for the transportation of their persons and property, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law; and "that the General Assembly shall, from time to time, pass laws establishing reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight on the different railroads of the State."

Sixth. That "no corporation shall issue any stock or bonds, except for money, labor or property actually received, and applied to the purposes for which such corporation was created," that "all stock dividends and other fictitious increase of the capital stock or indebtedness of any such corporation shall be void;" and that "the capital stock of no road shall be increased for any purpose, except upon giving sixty days' notice in such manner as may be prescribed."

Seventh. That "the General Assembly shall pass laws to correct abuses and prevent unjust discrimination and extortion in the rates of freight and passenger tariffs on the different railroads in the State, and enforce such laws by adequate penalties to the extent, if necessary for that purpose, of forfeiture of property and franchises."

Eighth. That "the exercise of the right of eminent domain shall never be so construed as to prevent the taking, by the General Assembly, of the property and franchises of incorporated companies already organized, and subjecting them to the public necessity the same as of individuals;" and that the "right of trial by jury shall be held inviolate in all trials of claims for compensation, when, in the exercise of said right of eminent domain, any incorporated company shall be interested either for or against the exercise of such right."

The provisions of the West Virginia Constitution of 1872, are somewhat similar in form and spirit. They provide, however, that the Legislature may allow of the consolidation or leasing of roads whose character are indicated in the fourth section of the above. The new Constitution of Nebraska prohibits subscriptions by municipalities to railroads, but allows donations of money when sanctioned by a majority vote; confers on the Legislature large powers over railroad management; declares railroads to be public highways, and authorizes the establishment of maximum rates of freight and transportation.

The new Constitution of Pennsylvania contains stringent provisions relative to railroads and their incorporation. But these provisions are aimed at the corruption which has characterized legislative dealing with the corporations, and are designed chiefly to restrain in that direction. Charters are to be rigidly limited in provisions, and forfeitures are to be enforced. In this sense the most ample sovereignty is proclaimed. The railroads are defined as public highways, and their operators subject to the common law requirement of "reasonable" rates as "common carriers."

A new Constitution is pending in the State of Missouri, with every probability, at the present writing, of being adopted. It is in many respects a remarkable instrument; especially in the restraining character of many sections. As an effort to embody sovereignty over the franchises created by the States, without interfering with the administrative and business details thereof, it is doubtless the most pronounced effort yet made in the United States.

In the "Bill of Rights," sections are incorporated declaring that no private property can be taken for public use without compensation, to be ascertained by a jury or board of commissioners, and the section proceeds to declare "that whenever an attempt is made to take private property for a use alleged to be public, the question whether the contemplated use be really public, shall be a judicial question, and as such judicially determined, without regard to any legislative assertion that the use is public." It is also provided that the fee of land taken for railroad tracks, without consent of the owner thereof, shall remain in such owner, subject to the use for which it is taken.

The article on "corporations" provides as to "railroads" —

That it shall not be lawful to charge (except as to special excursion or commutation tickets) for freight or passengers a greater amount for the transportation of the same for a less distance than the amount charged for any greater distance, and suitable laws shall be passed to enforce this.

That any properly organized corporation shall have the right to construct roads from and to any point in the State, and to connect at the State line with other roads; also to "intersect, connect with, or cross any other railroad, and shall receive and transport each the other's passengers, tonnage and cars, loaded or empty, without delay or discrimination." That all railroads shall be considered public highways, and all companies "common carriers." That laws shall be passed establishing reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight, and the same may be enforced by adequate penalties.

The same provisions in substance that are embodied in the Illinois Constitution, relative to the State officers of operating railroads, public access to stock books, reports to State auditor, etc., are repeated in the new Missouri instrument. Also, to the liability of seizure of rolling stock for debt; non-consolidation of competing or parallel roads.

Other sections maintain State control over roads which, though incorporated originally by the State, have been sold or leased to a corporation in some other State; provide that no retrospective law for the benefit of a railroad or other corporation, shall be passed; that existing roads shall not benefit by future legislation, except on condition of accepting all constitutional provisions applicable to railroads.

Additional sections provide that no railroad director, officer, agent, or employé, shall be interested in any manner in the furnishing of materials and supplies, or in the business of a common carrier, either of freight or passengers, over the lines where-with they are connected. Discriminating charges are not to be made either to companies or individuals, by abatement or drawback, and penalties may be levied against all parties violating these provisions.

Elsewhere, in the legislative article, provisions are inserted, designed to materially restrict the operations of the railroad or corporation lobbies whose influence has been found so pernicious. The provisions prohibit the Legislature from giving, lending, or pledging, in any manner whatever, the credit of the State to any corporation, municipal or otherwise; to grant money or other thing of public value; or to authorize any municipal corporation to do any of the acts which itself is prohibited from doing, or to allow of the same becoming a stockholder in any road or other corporation, or association. It is also prohibited from subscribing, in the name of the State, to any such stock, except to secure loans heretofore made; it may not release, or alienate, or change the terms of any lien now held by any railroad; nor has it any power to release or extinguish any obligation or debt due the State by any corporation theretofore organized.

The Constitutional Convention in Alabama had before it, and finally adopted, an article on "corporations," the sections of which, in relation to railroads, declare that all such corporations are common carriers, and all roads and canals to be public highways. Authority for all corporations under general laws to construct roads in the State, to and from any competing points. The Legislature is directed to pass laws to correct abuses and prevent unjust discriminations. The issuing of free passes to members of the State Government or Legislature in any form is prohibited. Provisions are also embraced prohibiting the issuing of fictitious stock, or of any such evidences of indebtedness or capital, except for value received and labor done.

This summary completes the statement of the attitude assumed by the several States

towards the railway system. It will be seen that they run the gamut of nearly every step short of the final ones—direct State supervision; direct control by State ownership. Massachusetts stands at one end of the first positive policy; and Missouri now seems to be at the other and affirmative terminus of the same course. The Railroad Commissioners of the first-named State seem to be united, judging by their reports and the more liberal utterance of their chairman, Charles Francis Adams, Jr., in the conviction that under present conditions, the best results can be obtained by such a board as their own, who occupy towards the public and the railroads a position somewhat similar to that filled by courts of conciliation, as they are now organized in England and some other countries for the settlement of disputes between labor and capital. Mr. Adams is very sure that in a State where the railroad stock is largely owned by resident investors, and the directors are therefore more or less controlled by the sentiment around them, that the creation and direction of public opinion by such a State Board, will in nearly every instance be sufficient to remove evils and settle disputes on the side of equity. He makes for this method the claim that it is more American and democratic than any policy of force, and points to the strange and new conditions which the railroad system necessarily creates, as requiring for the present, at least, a wise tentativeness in dealing therewith.

Next to the practical results of such a course as is pursued by the Massachusetts Commission—which Mr. Adams claims has worked effectively, in every instance—will follow the conclusions it has heretofore expressed, as to the ultimate consequences. The theory has been advanced, in their reports, that a "natural law of political evolution, governing transportation by rail, may now be formulated." This theory assumes that the European practice, of control

2. The enforcement or regulation of competition, by legislative interference.

3. Placing the roads under complete Executive supervision, as, for instance, in France.

4. The partial ownership of roads by the State, and its consequent appearance as competitor and regulator, as in Belgium.

5. State ownership and management, as in Prussia.

The Wisconsin Railroad Commissioners* take exception to these conclusions, as not applicable to America. As they have had a marked experience, the views expressed are worthy recapitulation. Their general conclusions are:

That the public character of railways is fully established.

That the consequent right, and the necessity of control, are nowhere in doubt.

The question of methods is then one of kind and degree. Early legislation has been inadequate; not sufficiently protecting the public; and it has been too special in its character. Remedial measures are needed; and, in the judgment of the Wisconsin Board, State ownership is wholly inapplicable. Competition may yet be preserved and maintained. Water routes may be made permanent, through but partial restraint. State supervision is as yet tentative in character, and should be more fully tested. The aim "should be to leave * * the largest freedom of action, compatible with a proper security of the public interests."

Wholesome restraints may be enforced by general enactments that look to—

Regulating railway charges, by establishing a maximum limitation of rates, or by fixing one of profits. Cheap fares are regarded with favor, and the power to revise freight tariffs is deemed essential.

Opinion seems adverse to the limitation of profits, on the ground that it would lead to covering up of real profits, remove an incentive to economy, encourage the increase of capital stock, and that, in any event, such limitation would become, at last, a tax on productive industry.

A great advantage would be gained by requiring the publicity of all rates of freight; securing greater stability, uniformity in classification, and timely notice of changes. An interchange of traffic, and the prohibition of unjust discrimination, would be of great utility. The State may, also, properly require punctuality in the running of trains, rigid inspection of construction and operation, sharper police requirements, a uniform and public method of keeping railway accounts, full and more frequent reports, the publicity of contracts, and distinct limitations upon corporate powers, such as experience has, or may hereafter, determine to be necessary.

Having thus completed a review of the special position assumed by some of the States, and the more general attitude, borne by all, towards the railway system of the United States, it would not be proper to close this paper without some reference to the positions assumed in Congress, and the decisions made by the Supreme Court as to the Constitutional powers possessed by the General Government over the regulation of inter-State commerce, as well as postal and military communication between them.

The interpretation placed upon the power to regulate commerce between the States, as well as to establish postal and military roads, by the political school that advocates State Sovereignty, is well understood. As to first object, it is interpreted only to mean commerce in the sense of materials, not as to the means or methods of traffic and interchange. So far as it relates to means of commercial inter-communication and transportation, it is claimed as relating only to natural highways—the water courses and the vehicles employed thereon.

The Supreme Court has, however, given a much broader construction to the provisions under which control, as a matter of commerce, is claimed over the railways of the country.

In one of the earliest cases, (Gibbon vs. Ogden,) Justice Marshall said: "Commerce as the word is used in the Constitution, is a unit, every part of which is indicated by the term."

Associate Justice Johnson said, in the same case, that: "In the advancement of society, labor, transportation, intelligence, care, and the various mediums of exchange, become commodities, and enter into commerce; the subject, the vehicle, the agent, and their various operations, become the objects of commercial regulation."

In another decision—that of the passenger cases—the Court said that commerce included "transporting the merchandise from the seller to the buyer, to gain the freight."

In the case of the United States vs. Combs, Mr. Justice Story affirmed, the power to regulate did not stop with the water. "It does not stop at the mere boundary line of a State, nor is it confined to acts done on the water, or in the necessary course of navigation thereof."

Chief Justice Taney decided, in another case, (Genessee Chief vs. Fitzhugh,) that admiralty jurisdiction was not co-extensive with the power to regulate commerce, the latter being "as extensive upon land as upon water. The Constitution makes no distinction in that respect."

In the most recent case—that relating to the right of Pennsylvania to impose a tonnage tax on all freight passing over her railroads—which was brought into court by the Philadelphia and Reading railroad, the decision, as to the power of Congress, is most emphatic. The Court said: "Beyond a question, the transportation of freight, or of the subjects of commerce, for the purpose of exchange or sale, is a constituent of commerce itself."

In the Mississippi River Bridge case, at Clinton, Iowa, Mr. Justice Miller decided that:

"When roads become parts of the great highways of our Union, acting an important part in a commerce which embraces many States, * * * there can be no doubt that to regulate them, is to regulate commerce, both with foreign nations and among the States, and to refuse to do this, is a refusal to discharge one of the most important duties of the Federal Government."

Congress has, in limited degree, but quite logically and directly, acted in the line of the principles thus announced. It has passed a number of general acts, affecting railroads. The principal of these acts are that of July 15, 1866, passed at the instance of the railroads themselves, which authorized companies, chartered by the States, to carry passengers, freights, &c., over any road connecting the several States, and to allow them to connect so as to form continuous lines of transportation. Another measure, directly affirming the power of Congress, is that known as the "cattle law," passed in 1872-3, by which regulations are made for more humane treatment of cattle in transitu.

A more recent act protects the rights of settlers on such public lands as are included within any railroad grants. Disputes have constantly occurred, generally ending to the disadvantage of the settler, who may have occupied a homestead in good faith, supposing it to be public land, and afterward found a railroad claiming it. Hereafter, the latter must leave the settler alone, and receive other land in lieu of the quarter section he occupies.

Another requires the land-grant railroads to take out patents for such lands as have been transferred to them, in pursuance of their grants. This is for the purpose of enabling the several States to tax this property. By other acts, the Government sought to make more secure its interest in the Pacific Railroads. Two important committees examined and reported to the Forty-Third Congress upon the general question. The Senate committee (Windom's) reported the following, among other recommendations, to be carried out by Congressional enactment :

1. That all railway companies, freight lines, and other common carriers, engaged in transporting passengers or freights from one State into or through another, be required, under proper penalties, to make publication, at every point of shipment from one State to another, of their rates and fares, embracing all particulars, and that they be prohibited from increasing such rates above the limit named in the publication, without reasonable notice to the public, to be prescribed by law.

2. That combinations and consolidations with parallel or competing lines, are such evils as to demand prompt and vigorous measures for their prevention.

3. That all such companies, engaged in inter-State traffic, should be required, under proper laws, to receipt for quantity, and to deliver the same at its destination.

4. That all railway companies and freight organizations, receiving freights in one State to be delivered in another, and whose lines touch at any river or lake port, be prohibited from charging more, to or from such port, than for any greater distance on the same line.

5. Congress to provide for a Bureau of Commerce, which shall require all such corporations engaged in inter-State transportation, to make a report, under oath, once each year, which should embrace, among other facts, the following, viz. : 1st. The rates and fares charged, from all points of shipment on its line in one State, to all points of destination in another State, including classifications and distances, and all drawbacks, deductions and discriminations ; 2d. A full and detailed statement of receipts and expenditures, including the compensation paid to officers, agents, and employes of the company ; 3d. The amount of stock and bonds issued, the price at which they were sold, and the disposition made of the funds received from such sale ; 4th. The amount and value of commodities transported during the year, as nearly as the same can be ascertained, together with such other facts as may be required by the head of such bureau, under the authority of law.

6. To regulate this great interest, the National or State Governments, or both combined, ought to own some of the trunk railroads, and regulate by competition.

7. To that end, the committee proposed the construction of several lines of freight railroad.

A committee of the House, of which Mr. Creary, of Iowa, was chairman, proposed a bill, which passed that body, in the session of 1873-4, providing for the appointment of a Board of Railway Commissioners, who should have extensive powers of regulation and revision.

No positive action was then taken, except to create a bureau or division in the Bureau of Statistics, the United States Treasury, which is charged with the gathering and reporting of statistics relating to inter-State commerce.

The endeavor has been made, in the foregoing, to present to the reader a clear and consecutive account :

1st. Of the magnitude of the world's railway system ;

2d. The power it has, or may exercise, in public affairs ;

3d. The present relations of the leading States and their governments, to the railway system ;

4th. The opinions entertained by prominent railroad men, engineers, and other experts ;

5th. The measures now being discussed, for the regulation or control of the system, here or elsewhere.

In this effort, reasonable success has, it is believed, been achieved ; and the result must prove of interest, as well as of value, alike to the general student and the specialist.

OUR FREE SCHOOL SYSTEM.

Shall our Public School System be changed ? Shall a division of the public funds be permitted, and a pro rata amount allowed to be expended under the direction of the Catholic Church ? These are practical questions now under discussion, and every citizen should seek to form a correct judgment thereon.

The position of the Republican party on this important question is not one of hostility to the Roman Catholic Church, but to the policy, which a certain branch of that Church has seen fit to adopt toward our Free School System. That policy is not defensive but aggressive in its character, and seeks, by an alliance with the Democratic party, to overthrow a system already established, a system that has worked well for many years, a system that is devoid of all sectarianism, unobjectionable to the various religious sects and creeds, beneficial alike to the Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Episcopalian, Jew and Pagan, and should be equally beneficial to the children of our Roman Catholic citizens. It is purely a secular system, intended to extend to all equal advantages in acquiring a good English education. The Republican party seeks to preserve this system from all religious interference, whether it comes from Protestant or Catholic influences. It clings to our free school system as to the rock of National safety, believing that any departure from it that will sanction a division of the Public School Funds, will be the entering wedge to disrupt the system, destroying its common benefits, and through this, work untold injury to our free institutions.

SHALL THE SYSTEM BE CHANGED ?

This is the vital question for the American people to answer, and this is the question now at issue in some of the leading States. It is not a religious question ; it is simply a political one that has entered largely into our politics. To discuss it, does not, of necessity, require an attack on, or a defence of the Catholic religion. If the Catholic Church is given prominence in the discussion, it is because no other Church seeks to change the system. All other sects and creeds are satisfied with it, as the very best system that can be devised for the education of the young, and the Republican party, in its present attitude on this question, simply says in effect : What is good for Protestant children cannot be injurious to Catholic children. What is satisfactory to all churches except the Catholic, cannot be changed at its command.

THE EFFECTS OF A CHANGE.

Supposing we should grant the demands of the Catholic Church, and give to the priests a pro rata portion of the School Money, what then ? We have granted it as an act of justice ; therefore, justice demands that the division of the School Money be continued, until every sect and creed has its share, leaving a small balance for the support of the schools belonging to the heathen outside the pale of the Church. Thus a great common blessing becomes, through a mistaken policy, so diluted in its distribution, that its character as a blessing is lost, and only the chosen few enjoy what the genius of our Government intended for the many. Therefore, to permit one dollar of the Public School Funds to be used for sectarian instruction, whether in the Catholic or Protestant faith, would be the beginning of an abuse that would end in the destruction of the Free School System. The whole system would be, in its practical effects, like the governments of South America, so broken up in petty divisions, each jealous of the other, as to totally destroy the majesty of government and make it little better than a public curse. Therefore, it becomes the duty of every citizen, whether Catholic or Protestant, to oppose the inception of any movement that has for its object the introduction of religious training in our schools, or the division of the Public School Funds, to be used in the interest of any particular sect or creed. Religious instruction belongs to the home circle; to the Church; to the Sunday School; to schools and seminaries supported by private contributions; to those organizations which are independent of public support, and which form no part of the machinery of State Government. To go beyond this, and enter the public schools, is to invite an antagonism that will not only injure the State, but seriously cripple the cause of religion itself.

THE RIGHTS OF THE STATE.

Catholic opposition to our Free School System is based on an erroneous idea of the functions of the State, and the relationship of the citizen thereto. The Catholic taxpayer objects to paying the school tax, because his children cannot receive, in the public schools, instruction in the Catholic faith. He might, with equal propriety, object to paying the tax levied for public charity, because the benefits are not confined to Catholics, or because the faith of the Roman Church is not impressed on every man, woman and child assisted by the fund. He might, with equal force, object to the tax levied for the support of hospitals, because the skill employed is not confined to Catholics, or the rites of the Church are not administered by the same hand that relieves suffering humanity. He might, with equal justice, object to paying a dollar of public tax, unless the amount collected is expended under the supervision of the Church, for its interests, by the hands of its duly appointed guardians.

To admit this principle of self-interest, in the expenditure of public moneys, would be to elevate the private interests of the citizen above the public interests of the State; it would be subversive of good government, because it would destroy that equity of administration that is essential to the peace and welfare of the State. Therefore, aside from the bad effects that would develop themselves in the school system, there is a dangerous principle underlying the claim for a division of the public funds, which, if not promptly denied by the emphatic voice of the people, will, sooner or later, undermine our form of government, and destroy our Republic.

THE CATHOLIC POLICY.

The policy of the Ultramontane branch of the Catholic Church appears to be the eventual control of the public schools of the United States, so as to make the Free Schools an important auxiliary in the growth of the Catholic Church. Its opposition to the present system has been slowly unfolding itself. First, its objection was to the comments made on the Bible by the teacher. The comments ceased, in deference to the objection raised. Then the Bible itself was objected to, and in many large cities, this, too, has been removed, so that no possible objection could be raised by the parents of Catholic children. But no sooner has the Bible been thrown from the window, than the priest with his catechism appears at the door. The comments have ceased, the Bible has gone, and now the priesthood unfold the next move by demanding that Catholic children shall have Catholic teachers and Catholic instruction, and this at the public expense. This is the present demand. Shall it be granted? If it is, the next move will be for the control of all the schools, through Democratic legislation, whenever and wherever possible. The issue is a plain one; it is not a religious one, but purely political; the Republican party standing on the defensive, to protect the Free School System, as it now exists—the Democratic party, under the influence of the Catholic policy, trying to change the system by giving to the Catholics a pro rata portion of the public funds, to be expended in the support of sectarian schools. To decide the question, it is not necessary to go into the past history of the Catholic Church, to show that, as a governing power, it is inconsistent with civil and religious liberty. Nor is it necessary to touch upon the character of the religion out of which this policy grows. It may be the best form public school. To depart from this time-honored practice, will be to open the door to abuses that will destroy the only safeguard of the State, the education of the young. To guard it against all encroachments, from without or within, is to preserve the purity of our free institutions and the simplicity of our form of government. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and to guard with jealous care our Free School System, becomes the sacred duty of every true American citizen.

On its face, and under the first flash of thought, the argument carries with it at least the appearance of plausibility. But when we examine the conditions under which the volume of currency was increased, and the causes which augmented and again reduced the premium on gold, the logic of the argument vanishes, like a morning mist before the rising sun. A brief reference only to the more prominent of these conditions and causes is required. But, first, it will be well to present to the reader a

Table showing the amount of paper currency in circulation, the value in currency of $100 in gold, and the value in gold of $100 in currency, in July, each year, from 1862 to 1875, inclusive.

Year.	Total currency in circulation.	Value in currency of $100 in gold.	Value in gold of $100 in currency.
1862	$332,794,000	$115 .5	$86 .6
1863	297,736,000	130 .6	76 .6
1864	512,072,000	258 .1	38 .7
1865	628,692,000	142 .1	70 .4
1866	708,031,000	151 .6	66
1867	693,090,000	139 .4	71 .7
1868	678,745,000	142 .7	70 .1
1869	676,508,000	136 .1	73 .5
1870	683,878,000	116 .8	85 .6
1871	721,582,000	112 .4	89
1872	731,355,000	114 .3	87 .5
1873	740,799,000	115 .7	86 .4
1874	777,538,000	110	91
1875	769,840,119	114 .8	87 .2

These figures can be accepted as correct. Those showing the yearly increase of paper currency, are taken from the records of the Comptroller of the Currency. The columns showing the value of gold in currency, and currency in gold, are from the daily record made by E. B. Elliott, Esq., Actuary of the U. S. Treasury.

Now, why has the premium on gold fallen, under an increase of paper currency? The answer is:

First. Because the Government has been faithful, and scrupulously exact in the fulfillment of all its promises. Its financial obligations have, in every case, been met and discharged; principal and interest are paid, as they fall due, and, generally, before they mature. Treaties with foreign Powers have been faithfully observed, and no Government, State, or individual can advance a single case of dereliction on the part of the United States Government.

Second. The price of gold was at its highest, in 1864. Gold was, in July of that year, at 258; greenbacks were then worth 38 cents on the dollar. And why? The preservation of the Union was then a matter of doubt—not so much by the Government, but by the doubting Thomases; and there were many of them, at home and abroad. In July of the following year, the gold price fell to 142, and greenbacks rose to 70. Why? The Government had closed the war. The Union was saved. Confidence was restored. But the debt burthen was enormous; and so, necessarily, were the Government expenditures. The fall in the price of gold, from 258, in 1864, to 142, in 1865, was really more than the financial condition of the Government reasonably warranted. The great fall in the gold premium was caused, partly, by the joy at the restoration of peace. This is seen in the fact that, in the following year, the price of gold went up to 151; but it fell, in 1867, to 139; in 1869, to 136; in 1870, to 116; and, in 1874, to 110.

Third. This large decrease in the price of gold, from year to year, and the corresponding appreciation of greenbacks, while the volume of currency continued to increase, is due, largely, to the continued integrity of the Government, in the fulfillment of its obligations.

Fourth. It is due, also, to the reduction of the public expenditures, from the enormous sum of $1,297,555,224, in 1865, to $274,623,392, in 1875, a period of ten years—an achievement probably without a parallel.

Fifth. It is due to the reduction of the public debt, to the extent of $550,000,000, and a reduction of $40,000,000, per annum, in the interest on the debt.

Sixth. It is due to a reduction of over $300,000,000 in the taxes, and the abolishment of the personal income tax.

Seventh. It is due to the funding of $500,000,000 of the public debt at 5 per cent., or one per cent. less than was formerly paid.

Eighth. It is due largely to the favoring influence of a generous Providence, in blessing the people with a succession of abundant harvests, affording a large surplus, over home consumption, with which to meet and discharge foreign obligations.

"But," say the Democratic inflationists, "how is it that the price of gold was at 110 in 1874, and is now up to 117?" The answer is plain to every intelligent mind. There is but one reply to the inquiry. It is owing to the consummate folly of the inflationists themselves, and to no other cause. The cry for "more money"—for "an indefinite amount of paper currency"—has alarmed capital, disturbed the money market at home and abroad, and threatens the country with ultimate repudiation.

Give Ohio to the Democracy and the price of gold will go up to 120; give them Pennsylvania, too, and it will reach 125; give them the Presidential election, under the inflation platforms of Ohio and Pennsylvania, and it will bound up to 150.

On the other hand, the past record of the Government, under Republican rule, is a safe and ample guarantee that the country will be guided on to the resumption of specie payments, within the time specified in the Finance Act of Congress, of January 14, 1875.

Which do the people prefer? Democracy, and gold at 150, with prospective repudiation; or Republicanism, with greenbacks at par with gold, and all the pledges of the Government faithfully carried out, in the future as in the past? It is for the people to solve this all-engrossing problem.

HOW ALABAMA'S ABANDONMENT OF SECESSION IS INTERPRETED.

Among mathematicians and statistical students, it is an accepted axiom, that, when you find an abrupt angle, a sudden decline or rise in a comparative statement or table, dealing with some general class of figures, an inquiry must be at once made into the cause. The same rule will hold good in other fields—the political, for instance. The Alabama Constitutional Convention, recently in session, seems to have suddenly faced about by the adoption of the following, as a section of the "Bill of Rights," in the new instrument they have prepared:

As the calling of this Convention was a Democratic policy, its election is their victory also. The studious observer of the Southern Democracy, could not but reasonably expect to see Alabama adopt, on this important issue, either silence, as in the case of Arkansas and Tennessee, almost open adherence, as in the case of Missouri, or an evasion, as in that of West Virginia. The States named have undergone the process of Democratic restoration, and what has been done therein, might reasonably be regarded as an evidence of what might be expected elsewhere.

The Mobile Register, the leading Bourbon journal of the South, comments with singular perspicuity, from its stand point, on the section just adopted. It shows how little real worth there is in the beating about the bush this illustrates, and illustrates, also, that the pestilent doctrine of State Sovereignty is still powerful:

Assuming that our Convention had an impossible nut to crack, we have to admit that this style of achieving it is about the best that could have been adopted. Don Quixote de la Mancha assailed the wind mill valorously, but the story leaves us no room to doubt that the wind mill survived the attack. If the Convention had said that from the "new nation" there can be no secession, we should have comprehended that Napoleon's "strongest battalions" had settled an important principle of autonomy. But we are confronted with a flat contradiction, when we are told that from the "Federal Union there can be no secession of any State." A "Federal Union," means a "league" of States, and a "league" necessarily implies a voluntary act of a free State or sovereignty. If the Federal Union was originally a forced Union, our fathers strangely misused and mistook the force of language. Federal is derived from the Latin Fœdus, a league, and its essential quality is agreement or consent. The word "Union," too, adds force to the idea of "consent." Now, if the late war has changed all this doctrine, why not acknowledge it openly, and call "a spade" "a spade." If it be true that a principle may be beaten out between sledge-hammer and anvil by sheer force, and that it cannot be called a principle a moment longer than the hearts and minds of men are hammered into accord by the same agency of force, then our General Government was changed by the war from a representative State Government, into one of central and consolidated powers. To ignore the right of secession, it is first necessary to adopt this doctrine. For to talk about State Rights after you have ignored State remedies, is a solecism in language and an absurdity in fact. But is it true in point of fact "that there can be no secession of any State from,"—we will not say the "Federal Union"—but the present Washington Government? Let us see: "Brother Jonathan" and "Johnny Reb." fell out and fought over a question of government. Brother J. was the strongest, and in the end "Johnny Reb." was beaten. Brother Jonathan laid down the law as he had established it—the sledge-hammer and anvil law. "Johnny Reb.," not satisfied with being obliged to submit to it, against all his beliefs and habits of thought, must needs go to work to help Brother Jonathan define his new principle of government, and what a pretty mess he makes of it is seen in our bill of rights olla podrida of force and consent. But does the bayonet of Brother Jonathan, backed by the ingenious interpretation of the Alabama Convention, make the new principle permanent or "establish the fact that there can be no secession of any State?" In the whirligig of time, suppose New England, headed by that most independent, daring and restless of the States, Massachusetts, should take it into her head that she would be better off outside of this nameless Government that Mr. Grant now rules, and New England could persuade Brother Jonathan to back her in the fancy. True, the Alabama Constitution, with this section of her bill of rights in it, will be on record against the right and power of New England, but that will not deprive her of the power. Our recent experience does not justify faith in the inviolability of parchment constitutions. But what have the people of Alabama and of the South, who fought so hard to maintain the State Rights principles of the Government, to do with this question? If they submit to the laws of war and to the stare decisis of arms, until arms shall reverse the judgment have they not done their whole duty in the premises? Are they called on to change their opinions and go back upon principles they believed to be vital to the liberties and happiness of the whole people of the United States? Otherwise why lug the case into court, coram non judice, unless it was because they were looking out to see "what Mrs. Grundy would say?" Isn't it enough to have to eat humble pie, with the best appetite that the duty and honor of the defeated side can command, without rolling it as a sweet morsel under the tongue, and smacking our lips and pronouncing it "good." Now there are men in that Convention of long settled pro-Union principles who could vote for this section cheerfully and conscientiously. But there are others who can only give such a vote after swallowing the convictions of a lifetime, and with them a lot of dirt most repulsive to a sound and wholesome moral and political digestion. And what makes it passing strange is, that there was not the least necessity for sitting down to such a noisome banquet of humble pie. And yet, in a body composed of the notables of our State, this section was "adopted unanimously." Not one member with a memory ten years old.

POPULAR EDUCATION.—Education is the handmaid of Liberty. Without intelligence, true freedom cannot long exist; it degenerates into license, and this soon leads to anarchy and ruin. An ignorant people cannot be trusted with self-government. They require a strong power to keep them within the bounds of law and order. This power they will not willingly create themselves. It must be created for them, and this necessarily leads to despotism. The hope of our country is in the growth and perpetuity of our Free School System. The State has no other defense. Without it, the State has new dangers to face daily. Religion becomes bigotry, and freedom dispensed by religious bigotry is worse than mockery. The State must guard with zealous care the government of its public schools. No sectarian influence should be allowed to interfere with that liberty of thought which prevails in our public schools. The young mind should be unfettered in its growth, so that its development may be strong and healthy.

The efforts made by the Catholic Church, or by any religious denomination, to control, in their interest, the public schools, should be frowned down by all good citizens, whether they belong to the Church or not. To permit these efforts to succeed, is to lay the foundation for future trouble. If one creed obtains control, another will be clamoring for it. Strife will follow; this will lead to bitterness of feeling, and finally end in the complete overthrow of the Free School System. Our Catholic citizens are as deeply interested in opposing any religious interference with our school system as those of other denominations. They should raise their voices against the movement, and if the question depends upon the ballot, they should so use that as to preserve, in all its usefulness and purity, the system of popular education that has already proven an inestimable benefit to our people.

POLITICAL CLASSIFICATION OF THE XLIVTH CONGRESS.

Below will be found a carefully classified list of the Members of the 44th Congress, with their political leanings. When (c) follows a Member's name, it signifies that his right to a seat in Congress is contested. The list is complete so far as certificates of election have been received and filed at Washington :

that of July 15, 1866, passed at the instance of the railroads themselves, which authorized companies, chartered by the States, to carry passengers, freights, &c., over any road connecting the several States, and to allow them to connect so as to form continuous lines of transportation. Another measure, directly affirming the power of Congress, is that known as the "cattle law," passed in 1872-3, by which regulations are made for more humane treatment of cattle in transitu.

A more recent act protects the rights of settlers on such public lands as are included within any railroad grants. Disputes have constantly occurred, generally ending to the disadvantage of the settler, who may have occupied a homestead in good faith, supposing it to be public land, and afterward found a railroad claiming it. Hereafter, the latter must leave the settler alone, and receive other land in lieu of the quarter section he occupies.

Another requires the land-grant railroads to take out patents for such lands as have been transferred to them, in pursuance of their grants. This is for the purpose of enabling the several States to tax this property. By other acts, the Government sought to make more secure its interest in the Pacific Railroads. Two important committees examined and reported to the Forty-Third Congress upon the general question. The Senate committee (Windom's) reported the following, among other recommendations, to be carried out by Congressional enactment :

1. That all railway companies, freight lines, and other common carriers, engaged in transporting passengers or freights from one State into or through another, be required, under proper penalties, to make publication, at every point of shipment from one State to another, of their rates and fares, embracing all particulars, and that they be prohibited from increasing such rates above the limit named in the publication, without reasonable notice to the public, to be prescribed by law.

2. That combinations and consolidations with parallel or competing lines, are such evils as to demand prompt and vigorous measures for their prevention.

3. That all such companies, engaged in inter-State traffic, should be required, under proper laws, to receipt for quantity, and to deliver the same at its destination.

4. That all railway companies and freight organizations, receiving freights in one State to be delivered in another, and whose lines touch at any river or lake port, be prohibited from charging more, to or from such port, than for any greater distance on the same line.

5. Congress to provide for a Bureau of Commerce, which shall require all such corporations engaged in inter-State transportation, to make a report, under oath, once each year, which should embrace, among other facts, the following, viz.: 1st. The rates and fares charged, from all points of shipment on its line in one State, to all points of destination in another State, including classifications and distances, and all drawbacks, deductions and discriminations; 2d. A full and detailed statement of receipts and expenditures, including the compensation paid to officers, agents, and employes of the company; 3d. The amount of stock and bonds issued, the price at which they were sold, and the disposition made of the funds received from such sale; 4th. The amount and value of commodities transported during the year, as nearly as the same can be ascertained, together with such other facts as may be required by the head of such bureau, under the authority of law.

6. To regulate this great interest, the National or State Governments, or both combined, ought to own some of the trunk railroads, and regulate by competition.

7. To that end, the committee proposed the construction of several lines of freight railroad.

A committee of the House, of which Mr. Creary, of Iowa, was chairman, proposed a bill, which passed that body, in the session of 1873-4, providing for the appointment of a Board of Railway Commissioners, who should have extensive powers of regulation and revision.

No positive action was then taken, except to create a bureau or division in the Bureau of Statistics, the United States Treasury, which is charged with the gathering and reporting of statistics relating to inter-State commerce.

The endeavor has been made, in the foregoing, to present to the reader a clear and consecutive account :

1st. Of the magnitude of the world's railway system ;

2d. The power it has, or may exercise, in public affairs ;

3d. The present relations of the leading States and their governments, to the railway system ;

4th. The opinions entertained by prominent railroad men, engineers, and other experts ;

5th. The measures now being discussed, for the regulation or control of the system, here or elsewhere.

In this effort, reasonable success has, it is believed, been achieved ; and the result must prove of interest, as well as of value, alike to the general student and the specialist.

OUR FREE SCHOOL SYSTEM.

Shall our Public School System be changed ? Shall a division of the public funds be permitted, and a pro rata amount allowed to be expended under the direction of the Catholic Church ? These are practical questions now under discussion, and every citizen should seek to form a correct judgment thereon.

The position of the Republican party on this important question is not one of hostility to the Roman Catholic Church, but to the policy, which a certain branch of that Church has seen fit to adopt toward our Free School System. That policy is not defensive but aggressive in its character, and seeks, by an alliance with the Democratic party, to overthrow a system already established, a system that has worked well for many years, a system that is devoid of all sectarianism, unobjectionable to the various religious sects and creeds, beneficial alike to the Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Episcopalian, Jew and Pagan, and should be equally beneficial to the children of our Roman Catholic citizens. It is purely a secular system, intended to extend to all equal advantages in acquiring a good English education. The Republican party seeks to preserve this system from all religious interference, whether it comes from Protestant or Catholic influences. It clings to our free school system as to the rock of National safety, believing that any departure from it that will sanction a division of the Public School Funds, will be the entering wedge to disrupt the system, destroying its common benefits, and through this, work untold injury to our free institutions.

SHALL THE SYSTEM BE CHANGED ?

This is the vital question for the American people to answer, and this is the question now at issue in some of the leading States. It is not a religious question ; it is simply a political one that has entered largely into our politics. To discuss it, does not, of necessity, require an attack on, or a defence of the Catholic religion. If the Catholic Church is given prominence in the discussion, it is because no other Church seeks to change the system. All other sects and creeds are satisfied with it, as the very best system that can be devised for the education of the young, and the Republican party, in its present attitude on this question, simply says in effect : What is good for Protestant children cannot be injurious to Catholic children. What is satisfactory to all churches except the Catholic, cannot be changed at its command.

THE EFFECTS OF A CHANGE.

Supposing we should grant the demands of the Catholic Church, and give to the priests a pro rata portion of the School Money, what then ? We have granted it as an act of justice ; therefore, justice demands that the division of the School Money be continued, until every sect and creed has its share, leaving a small balance for the support of the schools belonging to the heathen outside the pale of the Church. Thus a great common blessing becomes, through a mistaken policy, so diluted in its distribution, that its character as a blessing is lost, and only the chosen few enjoy what the genius of our Government intended for the many. Therefore, to permit one dollar of the Public School Funds to be used for sectarian instruction, whether in the Catholic or Protestant faith, would be the beginning of an abuse that would end in the destruction of the Free School System. The whole system would be, in its practical effects, like the governments of South America, so broken up in petty divisions, each jealous of the other, as to totally destroy the majesty of government and make it little better than a public curse. Therefore, it becomes the duty of every citizen, whether Catholic or Protestant, to oppose the inception of any movement that has for its object the introduction of religious training in our schools, or the division of the Public School Funds, to be used in the interest of any particular sect or creed. Religious instruction belongs to the home circle; to the Church; to the Sunday School; to schools and seminaries supported by private contributions; to those organizations which are independent of public support, and which form no part of the machinery of State Government. To go beyond this, and enter the public schools, is to invite an antagonism that will not only injure the State, but seriously cripple the cause of religion itself.

THE RIGHTS OF THE STATE.

Catholic opposition to our Free School System is based on an erroneous idea of the functions of the State, and the relationship of the citizen thereto. The Catholic taxpayer objects to paying the school tax, because his children cannot receive, in the public schools, instruction in the Catholic faith. He might, with equal propriety, object to paying the tax levied for public charity, because the benefits are not confined to Catholics, or because the faith of the Roman Church is not impressed on every man, woman and child assisted by the fund. He might, with equal force, object to the tax levied for the support of hospitals, because the skill employed is not confined to Catholics, or the rites of the Church are not administered by the same hand that relieves suffering humanity. He might, with equal justice, object to paying a dollar of public tax, unless the amount collected is expended under the supervision of the Church, for its interests, by the hands of its duly appointed guardians.

To admit this principle of self-interest, in the expenditure of public moneys, would be to elevate the private interests of the citizen above the public interests of the State; it would be subversive of good government, because it would destroy that equity of administration that is essential to the peace and welfare of the State. Therefore, aside from the bad effects that would develop themselves in the school system, there is a dangerous principle underlying the claim for a division of the public funds, which, if not promptly denied by the emphatic voice of the people, will, sooner or later, undermine our form of government, and destroy our Republic.

THE CATHOLIC POLICY.

The policy of the Ultramontane branch of the Catholic Church appears to be the eventual control of the public schools of the United States, so as to make the Free Schools an important auxiliary in the growth of the Catholic Church. Its opposition to the present system has been slowly unfolding itself. First, its objection was to the comments made on the Bible by the teacher. The comments ceased, in deference to the objection raised. Then the Bible itself was objected to, and in many large cities, this, too, has been removed, so that no possible objection could be raised by the parents of Catholic children. But no sooner has the Bible been thrown from the window, than the priest with his catechism appears at the door. The comments have ceased, the Bible has gone, and now the priesthood unfold the next move by demanding that Catholic children shall have Catholic teachers and Catholic instruction, and this at the public expense. This is the present demand. Shall it be granted? If it is, the next move will be for the control of all the schools, through Democratic legislation, whenever and wherever possible. The issue is a plain one; it is not a religious one, but purely political; the Republican party standing on the defensive, to protect the Free School System, as it now exists—the Democratic party, under the influence of the Catholic policy, trying to change the system by giving to the Catholics a pro rata portion of the public funds, to be expended in the support of sectarian schools. To decide the question, it is not necessary to go into the past history of the Catholic Church, to show that, as a governing power, it is inconsistent with civil and religious liberty. Nor is it necessary to touch upon the character of the religion out of which this policy grows. It may be the best form of religion or the worst the world ever saw. It may advance civilization, or it may retard its growth. All this has nothing to do with the question before the American people: "Shall religious interference be tolerated in our Free School System?" Thus far, it has been decided that it will not be tolerated, either in the interest of the Protestant or Catholic religion. Thus far, it has been decided that all shades of religion shall be treated alike, by strict impartiality in the education of all who seek the benefits of the public school. To depart from this time-honored practice, will be to open the door to abuses that will destroy the only safeguard of the State, the education of the young. To guard it against all encroachments, from without or within, is to preserve the purity of our free institutions and the simplicity of our form of government. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and to guard with jealous care our Free School System, becomes the sacred duty of every true American citizen.

THE LATEST DEMOCRATIC DODGE.

The Democrats of Ohio and Pennsylvania, in their respective political platforms, declare:

"That the contraction of the currency heretofore made by the Republican party, and the further contraction proposed by it, with a view to the forced resumption of specie payment, have already brought disaster to the business of the country, and threaten it with general bankruptcy and ruin."

And then they say:

"We demand that this policy be abandoned, and that the volume of currency be made and kept equal to the wants of trade."

The charge of contraction was promptly met by official figures, showing that there had been no "contraction" beyond the voluntary surrender by the banks of a few million dollars in currency, since the passage of the law in January last, providing for free banking and the resumption of specie payments. It was also shown, that no "contraction in the future" was contemplated. From this official evidence, that no reduction of currency has been made in the past, and that none is provided for or contemplated in the future, the deduction is easily made that the charge of "ruin and disaster from contraction" had no foundation in fact; and that the demand "that this policy be abandoned," was merely an attempted ruse to deceive the public.

The prompt publication of the following figures showing that the volume of currency has been steadily increasing, gave the public an opportunity of detecting the Democratic misstatement of the facts in the case, and forced the advocates of inflation to avoid that point, as far as possible, in their public speeches and in the Democratic press.

Unwilling, however, to acknowledge their error, they parry the blow that strikes the inflation plank from their platform, by declaring that—

"If the currency has been increasing in volume, and the premium on gold decreasing, a continuation of these conditions will soon bring the currency to par with gold, and specie payments will be reached."

On its face, and under the first flash of thought, the argument carries with it at least the appearance of plausibility. But when we examine the conditions under which the volume of currency was increased, and the causes which augmented and again reduced the premium on gold, the logic of the argument vanishes, like a morning mist before the rising sun. A brief reference only to the more prominent of these conditions and causes is required. But, first, it will be well to present to the reader a

Table showing the amount of paper currency in circulation, the value in currency of $100 in gold, and the value in gold of $100 in currency, in July, each year, from 1862 to 1875, inclusive.

Year.	Total currency in circulation.	Value in currency of $100 in gold.	Value in gold of $100 in currency.

1875	769,840,119	114 .8	87 .2

These figures can be accepted as correct. Those showing the yearly increase of paper currency, are taken from the records of the Comptroller of the Currency. The columns showing the value of gold in currency, and currency in gold, are from the daily record made by E. B. Elliott, Esq., Actuary of the U. S. Treasury.

Now, why has the premium on gold fallen, under an increase of paper currency? The answer is:

First. Because the Government has been faithful, and scrupulously exact in the fulfillment of all its promises. Its financial obligations have, in every case, been met and discharged; principal and interest are paid, as they fall due, and, generally, before they mature. Treaties with foreign Powers have been faithfully observed; and no Government, State, or individual can advance a single case of dereliction on the part of the United States Government.

Second. The price of gold was at its highest, in 1864. Gold was, in July of that year, at 258; greenbacks were then worth 38 cents on the dollar. And why? The preservation of the Union was then a matter of doubt—not so much by the Government, but by the doubting Thomases; and there were many of them, at home and abroad. In July of the following year, the gold price fell to 142, and greenbacks rose to 70. Why? The Government had closed the war. The Union was saved. Confidence was restored. But the debt burthen was enormous; and so, necessarily, were the Government expenditures. The fall in the price of gold, from 258, in 1864, to 142, in 1865, was really more than the financial condition of the Government reasonably warranted. The great fall in the gold premium was caused, partly, by the joy at the restoration of peace. This is seen in the fact that, in the following year, the price of gold went up to 151; but it fell, in 1867, to 139; in 1869, to 136; in 1870, to 116; and, in 1874, to 110.

Third. This large decrease in the price of gold, from year to year, and the corresponding appreciation of greenbacks, while the volume of currency continued to increase, is due, largely, to the continued integrity of the Government, in the fulfillment of its obligations.

Fourth. It is due, also, to the reduction of the public expenditures, from the enormous sum of $1,297,555,224, in 1865, to $274,623,392, in 1875, a period of ten years—an achievement probably without a parallel.

Fifth. It is due to the reduction of the public debt, to the extent of $550,000,000, and a reduction of $40,000,000, per annum, in the interest on the debt.

Sixth. It is due to a reduction of over $300,000,000 in the taxes, and the abolishment of the personal income tax.

Seventh. It is due to the funding of $500,000,000 of the public debt at 5 per cent., or one per cent. less than was formerly paid.

Eighth. It is due largely to the favoring influence of a generous Providence, in blessing the people with a succession of abundant harvests, affording a large surplus, over home consumption, with which to meet and discharge foreign obligations.

“But,” say the Democratic inflationists, “how is it that the price of gold was at 110 in 1874, and is now up to 117?” The answer is plain to every intelligent mind. There is but one reply to the inquiry. It is owing to the consummate folly of the inflationists themselves, and to no other cause. The cry for “more money”—for “an indefinite amount of paper currency”—has alarmed capital, disturbed the money market at home and abroad, and threatens the country with ultimate repudiation.

Give Ohio to the Democracy and the price of gold will go up to 120; give them Pennsylvania, too, and it will reach 125; give them the Presidential election, under the inflation platforms of Ohio and Pennsylvania, and it will bound up to 150.

On the other hand, the past record of the Government, under Republican rule, is a safe and ample guarantee that the country will be guided on to the resumption of specie payments, within the time specified in the Finance Act of Congress, of January 14, 1875.

Which do the people prefer? Democracy, and gold at 150, with prospective repudiation; or Republicanism, with greenbacks at par with gold, and all the pledges of the Government faithfully carried out, in the future as in the past? It is for the people to solve this all-engrossing problem.

HOW ALABAMA'S ABANDONMENT OF SECESSION IS INTERPRETED.

Among mathematicians and statistical students, it is an accepted axiom, that, when you find an abrupt angle, a sudden decline or rise in a comparative statement or table, dealing with some general class of figures, an inquiry must be at once made into the cause. The same rule will hold good in other fields—the political, for instance. The Alabama Constitutional Convention, recently in session, seems to have suddenly faced about by the adoption of the following, as a section of the "Bill of Rights," in the new instrument they have prepared:

As the calling of this Convention was a Democratic policy, its election is their victory also. The studious observer of the Southern Democracy, could not but reasonably expect to see Alabama adopt, on this important issue, either silence, as in the case of Arkansas and Tennessee, almost open adherence, as in the case of Missouri, or an evasion, as in that of West Virginia. The States named have undergone the process of Democratic restoration, and what has been done therein, might reasonably be regarded as an evidence of what might be expected elsewhere.

The Mobile Register, the leading Bourbon journal of the South, comments with singular perspicuity, from its stand point, on the section just adopted. It shows how little real worth there is in the beating about the bush this illustrates, and illustrates, also, that the pestilent doctrine of State Sovereignty is still powerful:

Assuming that our Convention had an impossible nut to crack, we have to admit that this style of achieving it is about the best that could have been adopted. Don Quixote de la Mancha assailed the wind mill valorously, but the story leaves us no room to doubt that the wind mill survived the attack. If the Convention had said that from the "new nation" there can be no secession, we should have comprehended that Napoleon's "strongest battalions" had settled an important principle of autonomy. But we are confronted with a flat contradiction, when we are told that from the "Federal Union there can be no secession of any State." A "Federal Union," means a "league" of States, and a "league" necessarily implies a voluntary act of a free State or sovereignty. If the Federal Union was originally a forced Union, our fathers strangely misused and mistook the force of language. Federal is derived from the Latin Fœdus, a league, and its essential quality is agreement or consent. The word "Union," too, adds force to the idea of "consent." Now, if the late war has changed all this doctrine, why not acknowledge it openly, and call "a spade" "a spade." If it be true that a principle may be beaten out between sledge-hammer and anvil by sheer force, and that it cannot be called a principle a moment longer than the hearts and minds of men are hammered into accord by the same agency of force, then our General Government was changed by the war from a representative State Government, into one of central and consolidated powers. To ignore the right of secession, it is first necessary to adopt this doctrine. For to talk about State Rights after you have ignored State remedies, is a solecism in language and an absurdity in fact. But is it true in point of fact "that there can be no secession of any State from,"—we will not say the "Federal Union"—but the present Washington Government? Let us see: "Brother Jonathan" and "Johnny Reb." fell out and fought over a question of government. Brother J. was the strongest, and in the end "Johnny Reb." was beaten. Brother Jonathan laid down the law as he had established it—the sledge-hammer and anvil law. "Johnny Reb.," not satisfied with being obliged to submit to it, against all his beliefs and habits of thought, must needs go to work to help Brother Jonathan define his new principle of government, and what a pretty mess he makes of it is seen in our bill of rights olla podrida of force and consent. But does the bayonet of Brother Jonathan, backed by the ingenious interpretation of the Alabama Convention, make the new principle permanent or "establish the fact that there can be no secession of any State?" In the whirligig of time, suppose New England, headed by that most independent, daring and restless of the States, Massachusetts, should take it into her head that she would be better off outside of this nameless Government that Mr. Grant now rules, and New England could persuade Brother Jonathan to back her in the fancy. True, the Alabama Constitution, with this section of her bill of rights in it, will be on record against the right and power of New England, but that will not deprive her of the power. Our recent experience does not justify faith in the inviolability of parchment constitutions. But what have the people of Alabama and of the South, who fought so hard to maintain the State Rights principles of the Government, to do with this question? If they submit to the laws of war and to the stare decisis of arms, until arms shall reverse the judgment have they not done their whole duty in the premises? Are they called on to change their opinions and go back upon principles they believed to be vital to the liberties and happiness of the whole people of the United States? Otherwise why lug the case into court, coram non judice, unless it was because they were looking out to see "what Mrs. Grundy would say?" Isn't it enough to have to eat humble pie, with the best appetite that the duty and honor of the defeated side can command, without rolling it as a sweet morsel under the tongue, and smacking our lips and pronouncing it "good." Now there are men in that Convention of long settled pro-Union principles who could vote for this section cheerfully and conscientiously. But there are others who can only give such a vote after swallowing the convictions of a lifetime, and with them a lot of dirt most repulsive to a sound and wholesome moral and political digestion. And what makes it passing strange is, that there was not the least necessity for sitting down to such a noisome banquet of humble pie. And yet, in a body composed of the notables of our State, this section was "adopted unanimously." Not one member with a memory ten years old.

POPULAR EDUCATION.—Education is the handmaid of Liberty. Without intelligence, true freedom cannot long exist; it degenerates into license, and this soon leads to anarchy and ruin. An ignorant people cannot be trusted with self-government. They require a strong power to keep them within the bounds of law and order. This power they will not willingly create themselves. It must be created for them, and this necessarily leads to despotism. The hope of our country is in the growth and perpetuity of our Free School System. The State has no other defense. Without it, the State has new dangers to face daily. Religion becomes bigotry, and freedom dispensed by religious bigotry is worse than mockery. The State must guard with zealous care the government of its public schools. No sectarian influence should be allowed to interfere with that liberty of thought which prevails in our public schools. The young mind should be unfettered in its growth, so that its development may be strong and healthy.

The efforts made by the Catholic Church, or by any religious denomination, to control, in their interest, the public schools, should be frowned down by all good citizens, whether they belong to the Church or not. To permit these efforts to succeed, is to lay the foundation for future trouble. If one creed obtains control, another will be clamoring for it. Strife will follow; this will lead to bitterness of feeling, and finally end in the complete overthrow of the Free School System. Our Catholic citizens are as deeply interested in opposing any religious interference with our school system as those of other denominations. They should raise their voices against the movement, and if the question depends upon the ballot, they should so use that as to preserve, in all its usefulness and purity, the system of popular education that has already proven an inestimable benefit to our people.

POLITICAL CLASSIFICATION OF THE XLIVTH CONGRESS.

Below will be found a carefully classified list of the Members of the 44th Congress, with their political leanings. When (c) follows a Member's name, it signifies that his right to a seat in Congress is contested. The list is complete so far as certificates of election have been received and filed at Washington :

ALABAMA UNDER DEMOCRACY.

A Constitutional Convention has recently adjourned in Alabama. Its chief work has been, under the instrument framed, to reduce the school fund, and make the Supreme Court an elective body. It was under control of the Democracy. In the present condition of the South, the subject of public education is of paramount importance. The following table, compiled from the ninth census, illustrates this :

STATES.	Total population of all ages, over 10.....	Total number that can read and write, over 10.....	Percentage of males.....	Percentage of females.....
Eleven South'n States.
Alabama.....	706,802	283,012	53.18	55.13
Arkansas.....	341,737	133,339	39.02	38.08
Florida.....	131,119	71,803	52.79	53.74
Georgia.....	835,929	468,593	54.80	57.22
Louisiana.....	526,392	276,158	51.15	53.75
Mississippi.....	581,206	313,310	52.49	55.30
N. Carolina..	769,629	397,690	49.34	53.79
S. Carolina...	503,763	290,379	56.84	58.34
Tennessee....	890,872	364,697	37.42	44.31
Texas.....	571,075	221,703	37.18	40.60
Virginia	890,056	445,893	49.44	50.77
	6,658,579	3,386,577

The school population of Alabama, (all between the ages of five and seventeen,) by the same census was 342,976, of whom 181,787, were white, and 161,156 colored, children. According to the reports of the National Bureau of Education, there was :

In 1869, a school fund of.....	$524,621.68
In 1870, "	500,409.18
In 1871, "	581,389.29
In 1872, "	640,627.83

In the same years, the attendance was as follows :

	Children.
1869, (estimated by Dr. Sears, Gen'l Agent Peabody Fund).....	160,000
1871, (State Reports, 86,976 whites, and 54,336 colored)	141,312

The average attendance was about 107,666. These figures denote the result, under Republican rule, or rather at its beginnings. Since then, the State has passed under Democratic control. What is its record, in this important particular ? Let the facts reply !

The school fund has been reduced. The school attendance is much less. The number of schools has decreased. The supervision has deteriorated, and the pay of teachers has not only been lessened, but made irregular in its receipt. The total reduction of the school fund, under Democratic legislation, has reached $227,017. The attendance has decreased over one-third.

The Constitutional Convention has carried out this Bourbon policy. The following is the Mobile Register's synopsis of the Article on Education, as adopted, in all its main features :

1. Separate schools are furnished for the white and colored children, and neither race is permitted to attend the schools of the other.
2. The school fund is to be derived from the following sources : Any lands, money or other property that may be given by any individual, or by the State, for school purposes ; all escheats and equivalents for exemption from military duty ; a poll tax of $1.50 ; the interest on the 16th section and surplus revenue fund ; not less than $100,000 annually to be appropriated by the General Assembly, but which must be increased from time to time, as the condition of the Treasury and resources of the State will permit.
3. The expenses of disbursement of school fund, not to exceed four per cent.
4. Trustees for the State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College, to be appointed by the Governor, by and with the consent and approval of the Senate.
5. The University and A. and M. College shall not be removed from present location.
6. A Superintendent of Public Instruction to be appointed.
7. The duties of County Superintendent to be performed by township trustees.

Under this, the present Board of Education is abolished. It is perhaps as well, as being a piece of cumbersome machinery. The object in establishing it was to have some influential and active citizen in every Congressional District officially interested in the establishment of a system, new to all and against which the prejudices of many were pre-arrayed. The providing for a State Superintendent is an unexpected concession to modern ideas ; but the return to the township trustee superintendency, is a fatal error. It is enthroning inefficiency, and indifference and prejudice, over all the local details—those which are most important. There can be no doubt but that the larger proportion of such white persons as are in the main likely to be selected for school trustees, will be at heart hostile or indifferent. They, like the scholars, need education.

The whole tendency of Democratic administration is, to impair the Free School System. Time corrects the evils their prejudices create; but then there is a fatal loss, any way. The Democrats got possession of Alabama, in 1873. The following report of the schools, for the nine months of the present year, will show, conclusively, the retrograde spirit which now controls:

TOTAL NUMBER ENROLLED.

	Whites	Colored.	Total.
First quarter.....	5,954	4,687	10,641
Second quarter.....	24,095	23,794	47,889
Third quarter.....	45,705	32,868	78,573

	Whites.	Colored.	Total.
First quar'r, schools taught	171	94	265
Sec'd quar'r, schools taught	810	573	1,383
Third quar'r, schools taught	1,540	948	2,488

	Whites.	Colored.	Total.
First quarter, No. teachers.	203	105	318
Sec'd quarter, No. teachers,	866	622	1,488
Third quar'r, No. teachers,	1,689	973	2,671

Average pay of teachers per month for three quarters, $32.68.

Number of days taught for three quarters, 125.

Amount paid teachers—white schools, $141,579; colored, $132,745.

Number of counties in which schools were taught—23 first quarter; 37 second quarter; 65 third quarter.

Compare the best quarter of 1875 with the figures of attendance, given for 1869 and 1871, and also with the number of children in the State, of school age, in 1874. Hon. Joseph Speed, State Superintendent, then stated the number of white children at 233,333; colored children, 172,506; total, 405,839. The present attendance shows a decrease from 1871, of 29,093 pupils, as to average attendance, and of 62,739 less enrollment. It appears that, under Democratic management, the State owes the school fund over $500,000. This indebtedness has grown up in less than three years. These facts all tend to establish that Democratic rule is the rule of ignorance.

The following paragraph is from an address just issued by a committee of the Democratic majority of the Convention, to the people of Alabama. It affords both confession and defense of the Bourbon policy of destroying the efficiency of the School System:

In relation to the Public Schools the Convention has made the most salutary changes.

The great complaint has been that there were too many unnecessary officers, and too much useless machinery employed, to handle the school fund, and that the money thus expended should be saved for teaching the children. The Convention abolished the School Board, and thereby abolished the expense of another Legislature to do what could be safely required of the General Assembly. The impoverished condition of the people, and the immense burden of State, and county, and city taxation, which they are now unable to carry, compelled your delegates to refuse to pile up any more weight, until the people recovered their strength, unloaded, and had time to rest and collect the means to devote to Public Schools. The Convention acted on these principles in providing, as it did in the new Constitution, for the support of Public Schools. It was estimated that from the sources specified in the new Constitution, the amount that could be certainly raised for school purposes, would be about three hundred and two thousand dollars. If the people and the tax collectors do their duty, the provisions of the new Constitution will produce more money for the support of Public Schools than has heretofore been expended in actual teaching. The Convention has saved at least fifty thousand dollars per annum in abolishing the School Board, and limiting the amount to be paid for officers to four per centum of the school fund, thus leaving ninety-six per centum to pay teachers. The poll tax collected in each county is to be kept in each county, and applied there to Public Schools. The failure to collect more of the poll tax is chargeable to the tax collectors. There are in the State over two hundred thousand voters, and the amount of poll taxes collected has not reached more than seventy-five thousand dollars per annum. As each county would be entitled to its own poll tax, the people in each township, and especially the Trustees, will give special attention to the payment of the poll tax, and it is believed that this change will add at least seventy-five thousand dollars per annum to the school fund. If any fear that the new Constitution has impaired the Public Schools, in not providing a sufficient fund to support them, exists, such apprehension must be dispelled by the first section of the twelfth article, which provides that "the General Assembly shall establish, organize, and maintain a system of Public Schools throughout the State, for the equal benefit of all children between the ages of seven and twenty-one years." The Convention gave every dollar that could be spared at this time for Public Schools, and if it is found that the system is likely to suffer for want of more money, the General Assembly has the full authority to appropriate

a public curse. Therefore, it becomes the duty of every citizen, whether Catholic or Protestant, to oppose the inception of any movement that has for its object the introduction of religious training in our schools, or the division of the Public School Funds, to be used in the interest of any particular sect or creed. Religious instruction belongs to the home circle; to the Church; to the Sunday School; to schools and seminaries supported by private contributions; to those organizations which are independent of public support, and which form no part of the machinery of State Government. To go beyond this, and enter the public schools, is to invite an antagonism that will not only injure the State, but seriously cripple the cause of religion itself.

THE RIGHTS OF THE STATE.

Catholic opposition to our Free School System is based on an erroneous idea of the functions of the State, and the relationship of the citizen thereto. The Catholic taxpayer objects to paying the school tax, because his children cannot receive, in the public schools, instruction in the Catholic faith. He might, with equal propriety, object to paying the tax levied for public charity, because the benefits are not confined to Catholics, or because the faith of the Roman Church is not impressed on every man, woman and child assisted by the fund. He might, with equal force, object to the tax levied for the support of hospitals, because the skill employed is not confined to Catholics, or the rites of the Church are not administered by the same hand that relieves suffering humanity. He might, with equal justice, object to paying a dollar of public tax, unless the amount collected is expended under the supervision of the Church, for its interests, by the hands of its duly appointed guardians.

To admit this principle of self-interest, in the expenditure of public moneys, would be to elevate the private interests of the citizen above the public interests of the State; it would be subversive of good government, because it would destroy that equity of administration that is essential to the peace and welfare of the State. Therefore, aside from the bad effects that would develop themselves in the school system, there is a dangerous principle underlying the claim for a division of the public funds, which, if not promptly denied by the emphatic voice of the people, will, sooner or later, undermine our form of government, and destroy our Republic.

THE CATHOLIC POLICY.

The policy of the Ultramontane branch of the Catholic Church appears to be the eventual control of the public schools of the United States, so as to make the Free Schools an important auxiliary in the growth of the Catholic Church. Its opposition to the present system has been slowly unfolding itself. First, its objection was to the comments made on the Bible by the teacher. The comments ceased, in deference to the objection raised. Then the Bible itself was objected to, and in many large cities, this, too, has been removed, so that no possible objection could be raised by the parents of Catholic children. But no sooner has the Bible been thrown from the window, than the priest with his catechism appears at the door. The comments have ceased, the Bible has gone, and now the priesthood unfold the next move by demanding that Catholic children shall have Catholic teachers and Catholic instruction, and this at the public expense. This is the present demand. Shall it be granted? If it is, the next move will be for the control of all the schools, through Democratic legislation, whenever and wherever possible. The issue is a plain one; it is not a religious one, but purely political; the Republican party standing on the defensive, to protect the Free School System, as it now exists—the Democratic party, under the influence of the Catholic policy, trying to change the system by giving to the Catholics a pro rata portion of the public funds, to be expended in the support of sectarian schools. To decide the question, it is not necessary to go into the past history of the Catholic Church, to show that, as a governing power, it is inconsistent with civil and religious liberty. Nor is it necessary to touch upon the character of the religion out of which this policy grows. It may be the best form public school. To depart from this time-honored practice, will be to open the door to abuses that will destroy the only safeguard of the State, the education of the young. To guard it against all encroachments, from without or within, is to preserve the purity of our free institutions and the simplicity of our form of government. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and to guard with jealous care our Free School System, becomes the sacred duty of every true American citizen.

forced the advocates of inflation to avoid that point, as far as possible, in their public speeches and in the Democratic press.

Circulation of Paper Currency, 1861 to 1875.

[illegible]

Unwilling, however, to acknowledge their error, they parry the blow that strikes the inflation plank from their platform, by declaring that—

On its face, and under the first flash of thought, the argument carries with it at least the appearance of plausibility. But when we examine the conditions under which the volume of currency was increased, and the causes which augmented and again reduced the premium on gold, the logic of the argument vanishes, like a morning mist before the rising sun. A brief reference only to the more prominent of these conditions and causes is required. But, first, it will be well to present to the reader a

Table showing the amount of paper currency in circulation, the value in currency of $100 in gold, and the value in gold of $100 in currency, in July, each year, from 1862 to 1875, inclusive.

Year.	Total currency in circulation.	Value in currency of $100 in gold.	Value in gold of $100 in currency.
1862	$332,794,000	$115 .5	$86 .6
1863	297,736,000	130 .6	76 .6
1864	502,072,000	258 .1	38 .7
1865	2,000	142 .1	70 .4
1866	1,000	151 .6	66
1867	0,000	139 .4	71 .7
1868	5,000	142 .7	70 .1
1869	8,000	136 .1	73 .5
1870	8,000	116 .8	85 .6
1871	2,000	112 .4	89
1872	731,355,000	114 .3	87 .5
1873	740,799,000	115 .7	86 .4
1874	777,538,000	110	91
1875	769,840,119	114 .8	87 .2

These figures can be accepted as correct. Those showing the yearly increase of paper currency, are taken from the records of the Comptroller of the Currency. The columns showing the value of gold in currency, and currency in gold, are from the daily record made by E. B. Elliott, Esq., Actuary of the U. S. Treasury.

Now, why has the premium on gold fallen, under an increase of paper currency? The answer is—

First. Because the Government has been faithful, and scrupulously exact in the fulfillment of all its promises. Its financial obligations have, in every case, been met and discharged; principal and interest are paid, as they fall due, and, generally, before they mature. Treaties with foreign Powers have been faithfully observed; and no Government, State, or individual can advance a single case of dereliction on the part of the United States Government.

Second. The price of gold was at its highest, in 1864. Gold was, in July of that year, at 258, greenbacks were then worth 38 cents on the dollar. And why? The preservation of the Union was then a matter of doubt—not so much by the Government, but by the doubting Thomases; and there were many of them, at home and abroad. In July of the following year, the gold price fell to 142, and greenbacks rose to 70. Why? The Government had closed the war. The Union was saved. Confidence was restored. But the debt burthen was enormous; and so, necessarily, were the Government expenditures. The fall in the price of gold, from 258, in 1864, to 142, in 1865, was really more than the financial condition of the Government reasonably warranted. The great fall in the gold premium was caused, partly, by the joy at the restoration of peace. This is seen in the fact that, in the following year, the price of gold went up to 151; but it fell, in 1867, to 139; in 1869, to 136; in 1870, to 116; and, in 1874, to 110.

Third. This large decrease in the price of gold, from year to year, and the corresponding appreciation of greenbacks, while the volume of currency continued to increase, is due, largely, to the continued integrity of the Government, in the fulfillment of its obligations.

Fourth. It is due, also, to the reduction of the public expenditures, from the enormous sum of $1,297,555,224, in 1865, to $274,623,392, in 1875, a period of ten years—an achievement probably without a parallel.

Fifth. It is due to the reduction of the public debt, to the extent of $550,000,000, and a reduction of $40,000,000, per annum, in the interest on the debt.

Sixth. It is due to a reduction of over $300,000,000 in the taxes, and the abolishment of the personal income tax.

Seventh. It is due to the funding of $500,000,000 of the public debt at 5 per cent., or one per cent. less than was formerly paid.

Eighth. It is due largely to the favoring influence of a generous Providence, in blessing the people with a succession of abundant harvests, affording a large surplus, over home consumption, with which to meet and discharge foreign obligations.

"But," say the Democratic inflationists, "how is it that the price of gold was at 110 in 1874, and is now up to 117?" The answer is plain to every intelligent mind. There is but one reply to the inquiry. It is owing to the consummate folly of the inflationists themselves, and to no other cause. The cry for "more money"—for "an indefinite amount of paper currency"—has alarmed capital, disturbed the money market at home and abroad, and threatens the country with ultimate repudiation.

Give Ohio to the Democracy and the price of gold will go up to 120; give them Pennsylvania, too, and it will reach 125; give them the Presidential election, under the inflation platforms of Ohio and Pennsylvania, and it will bound up to 150.

On the other hand, the past record of the Government, under Republican rule, is a safe and ample guarantee that the country will be guided on to the resumption of specie payments, within the time specified in the Finance Act of Congress, of January 14, 1875.

Which do the people prefer? Democracy, and gold at 150, with prospective repudiation; or Republicanism, with greenbacks at par with gold, and all the pledges of the Government faithfully carried out, in the future as in the past? It is for the people to solve this all-engrossing problem.

HOW ALABAMA'S ABANDONMENT OF SECESSION IS INTERPRETED.

Among mathematicians and statistical students, it is an accepted axiom, that, when you find an abrupt angle, a sudden decline or rise in a comparative statement or table, dealing with some general class of figures, an inquiry must be at once made into the cause. The same rule will hold good in other fields—the political, for instance. The Alabama Constitutional Convention, recently in session, seems to have suddenly faced about by the adoption of the following, as a section of the "Bill of Rights," in the new instrument they have prepared:

As the calling of this Convention was a Democratic policy, its election is their victory also. The studious observer of the Southern Democracy, could not but reasonably expect to see Alabama adopt, on this important issue, either silence, as in the case of Arkansas and Tennessee, almost open adherence, as in the case of Missouri, or an evasion, as in that of West Virginia. The States named have undergone the process of Democratic restoration, and what has been done therein, might reasonably be regarded as an evidence of what might be expected elsewhere.

The Mobile Register, the leading Bourbon journal of the South, comments with singular perspicuity, from its stand point, on the section just adopted. It shows how little real worth there is in the beating about the bush this illustrates, and illustrates, also, that the pestilent doctrine of State Sovereignty is still powerful:

Assuming that our Convention had an impossible nut to crack, we have to admit that this style of achieving it is about the best that could have been adopted. Don Quixote de la Mancha assailed the wind mill valorously, but the story leaves us no room to doubt that the wind mill survived the attack. If the Convention had said that from the "new nation" there can be no secession, we should have comprehended that Napoleon's "strongest battalions" had settled an important principle of autonomy. But we are confronted with a flat contradiction, when we are told that from the "Federal Union there can be no secession of any State." A "Federal Union," means a "league" of States, and a "league" necessarily implies a voluntary act of a free State or sovereignty. If the Federal Union was originally a forced Union, our fathers strangely misused and mistook the force of language. Federal is derived from the Latin Fœdus, a league, and its essential quality is agreement or consent. The word "Union," too, adds force to the idea of "consent." Now, if the late war has changed all this doctrine, why not acknowledge it openly, and call "a spade" "a spade." If it be true that a principle may be beaten out between sledge-hammer and anvil by sheer force, and that it cannot be called a principle a moment longer than the hearts and minds of men are hammered into accord by the same agency of force, then our General Government was changed by the war from a representative State Government, into one of central and consolidated powers. To ignore the right of secession, it is first necessary to adopt this doctrine. For to talk about State Rights after you have ignored State remedies, is a solecism in language and an absurdity in fact. But is it true in point of fact "that there can be no secession of any State from,"—we will not say the "Federal Union"—but the present Washington Government? Let us see: "Brother Jonathan" and "Johnny Reb." fell out and fought over a question of government. Brother J. was the strongest, and in the end "Johnny Reb." was beaten. Brother Jonathan laid down the law as he had established it—the sledge-hammer and anvil law. "Johnny Reb.," not satisfied with being obliged to submit to it, against all his beliefs and habits of thought, must needs go to work to help Brother Jonathan define his new principle of government, and what a pretty mess he makes of it is seen in our bill of rights olla podrida of force and consent. But does the bayonet of Brother Jonathan, backed by the ingenious interpretation of the Alabama Convention, make the new principle permanent or "establish the fact that there can be no secession of any State?" In the whirligig of time, suppose New England, headed by that most independent, daring and restless of the States, Massachusetts, should take it into her head that she would be better off outside of this nameless Government that Mr. Grant now rules, and New England could persuade Brother Jonathan to back her in the fancy. True, the Alabama Constitution, with this section of her bill of rights in it, will be on record against the right and power of New England, but that will not deprive her of the power. Our recent experience does not justify faith in the inviolability of parchment constitutions. But what have the people of Alabama and of the South, who fought so hard to maintain the State Rights principles of the Government, to do with this question? If they submit to the laws of war and to the stare decisis of arms, until arms shall reverse the judgment have they not done their whole duty in the premises? Are they called on to change their opinions and go back upon principles they believed to be vital to the liberties and happiness of the whole people of the United States? Otherwise why lug the case into court, coram non judice, unless it was because they were looking out to see "what Mrs. Grundy would say?" Isn't it enough to have to eat humble pie, with the best appetite that the duty and honor of the defeated side can command, without rolling it as a sweet morsel under the tongue, and smacking our lips and pronouncing it "good." Now there are men in that Convention of long settled pro-Union principles who could vote for this section cheerfully and conscientiously. But there are others who can only give such a vote after swallowing the convictions of a lifetime, and with them a lot of dirt most repulsive to a sound and wholesome moral and political digestion. And what makes it passing strange is, that there was not the least necessity for sitting down to such a noisome banquet of humble pie. And yet, in a body composed of the notables of our State, this section was "adopted unanimously." Not one member with a memory ten years old.

POPULAR EDUCATION.—Education is the handmaid of Liberty. Without intelligence, true freedom cannot long exist; it degenerates into license, and this soon leads to anarchy and ruin. An ignorant people cannot be trusted with self-government. They require a strong power to keep them within the bounds of law and order. This power they will not willingly create themselves. It must be created for them, and this necessarily leads to despotism. The hope of our country is in the growth and perpetuity of our Free School System. The State has no other defense. Without it, the State has new dangers to face daily. Religion becomes bigotry, and freedom dispensed by religious bigotry is worse than mockery. The State must guard with zealous care the government of its public schools. No sectarian influence should be allowed to interfere with that liberty of thought which prevails in our public schools. The young mind should be unfettered in its growth, so that its development may be strong and healthy.

The efforts made by the Catholic Church, or by any religious denomination, to control, in their interest, the public schools, should be frowned down by all good citizens, whether they belong to the Church or not. To permit these efforts to succeed, is to lay the foundation for future trouble. If one creed obtains control, another will be clamoring for it. Strife will follow; this will lead to bitterness of feeling, and finally end in the complete overthrow of the Free School System. Our Catholic citizens are as deeply interested in opposing any religious interference with our school system as those of other denominations. They should raise their voices against the movement, and if the question depends upon the ballot, they should so use that as to preserve, in all its usefulness and purity, the system of popular education that has already proven an inestimable benefit to our people.

POLITICAL CLASSIFICATION OF THE XLIVTH CONGRESS.

Below will be found a carefully classified list of the Members of the 44th Congress, with their political leanings. When (c) follows a Member's name, it signifies that his right to a seat in Congress is contested. The list is complete so far as certificates of election have been received and filed at Washington :

ALABAMA UNDER DEMOCRACY.

A Constitutional Convention has recently adjourned in Alabama. Its chief work has been, under the instrument framed, to reduce the school fund, and make the Supreme Court an elective body. It was under control of the Democracy. In the present condition of the South, the subject of public education is of paramount importance. The following table, compiled from the ninth census, illustrates this :

STATES.	Total population of all ages, over 10.....	Total number that can not read and write, over 10.....	Percentage of males.....	Percentage of females.....
Eleven South'n States.

The school population of Alabama, (all between the ages of five and seventeen,) by the same census was 342,976, of whom 181,787, were white, and 161,156 colored, children. According to the reports of the National Bureau of Education, there was :

In 1869, a school fund of.....	$524,621.68
In 1870, "	500,409.18
In 1871, "	581,389.29
In 1872, "	640,627.83

In the same years, the attendance was as follows :

	Children.
1869, (estimated by Dr. Sears, Gen'l Agent Peabody Fund).....	160,000
1871, (State Reports, 86,976 whites, and 54,336 colored)	141,312

The average attendance was about 107,666. These figures denote the result, under Republican rule, or rather at its beginnings. Since then, the State has passed under Democratic control. What is its record, in this important particular ? Let the facts reply !

The school fund has been reduced. The school attendance is much less. The number of schools has decreased. The supervision has deteriorated, and the pay of teachers has not only been lessened, but made irregular in its receipt. The total reduction of the school fund, under Democratic legislation, has reached $227,017. The attendance has decreased over one-third.

The Constitutional Convention has carried out this Bourbon policy. The following is the Mobile Register's synopsis of the Article on Education, as adopted, in all its main features :

1. Separate schools are furnished for the white and colored children, and neither race is permitted to attend the schools of the other.
 2. The school fund is to be derived from the following sources : Any lands, money or other property that may be given by any individual, or by the State, for school purposes ; all escheats and equivalents for exemption from military duty ; a poll tax of $1.50 ; the interest on the 16th section and surplus revenue fund ; not less than $100,000 annually to be appropriated by the General Assembly, but which must be increased from time to time, as the condition of the Treasury and resources of the State will permit.
 3. The expenses of disbursement of school fund, not to exceed four per cent.
 4. Trustees for the State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College, to be appointed by the Governor, by and with the consent and approval of the Senate.
 5. The University and A. and M. College shall not be removed from present location.
 6. A Superintendent of Public Instruction to be appointed.
 7. The duties of County Superintendent to be performed by township trustees.
- Under this, the present Board of Education is abolished. It is perhaps as well, as being a piece of cumbersome machinery. The object in establishing it was to have some influential and active citizen in every Congressional District officially interested in the establishment of a system, new to all and against which the prejudices of many were pre-arrayed. The providing for a State Superintendent is an unexpected concession to modern ideas ; but the return to the township trustee superintendency, is a fatal error. It is enthroning inefficiency, and indifference and prejudice, over all the local details—those which are most important. There can be no doubt but that the larger proportion of such white persons as are in the main likely to be selected for school trustees, will be at heart hostile or indifferent. They, like the scholars, need education.

The whole tendency of Democratic administration is, to impair the Free School System. Time corrects the evils their prejudices create; but then there is a fatal loss, any way. The Democrats got possession of Alabama, in 1873. The following report of the schools, for the nine months of the present year, will show, conclusively, the retrograde spirit which now controls:

TOTAL NUMBER ENROLLED.

	Whites	Colored.	Total.
First quarter.....	5,954	4,687	10,641
Second quarter.....	24,095	23,794	47,889

Average pay of teachers per month for three quarters, $32.08.

Number of days taught for three quarters, 125.

Amount paid teachers—white schools, $141,579; colored, $132,745.

Number of counties in which schools were taught—23 first quarter; 57 second quarter; 65 third quarter.

Compare the best quarter of 1875 with the figures of attendance, given for 1869 and 1871, and also with the number of children in the State, of school age, in 1874. Hon. Joseph Speed, State Superintendent, then stated the number of white children at 233,333; colored children, 172,506; total, 405,839. The present attendance shows a decrease from 1871, of 29,093 pupils, as to average attendance, and of 62,739 less enrollment. It appears that, under Democratic management, the State owes the school fund over $500,000. This indebtedness has grown up in less than three years. These facts all tend to establish that Democratic rule is the rule of ignorance.

The following paragraph is from an address just issued by a committee of the Democratic majority of the Convention, to the people of Alabama. It affords both confession and defense of the Bourbon policy of destroying the efficiency of the School System:

In relation to the Public Schools the Convention has made the most salutary changes.

The great complaint has been that there were too many unnecessary officers, and too much useless machinery employed, to handle the school fund, and that the money thus expended should be saved for teaching the children. The Convention abolished the School Board, and thereby abolished the expense of another Legislature to do what could be safely required of the General Assembly. The impoverished condition of the people, and the immense burden of State, and county, and city taxation, which they are now unable to carry, compelled your delegates to refuse to pile up any more weight, until the people recovered their strength, unloaded, and had time to rest and collect the means to devote to Public Schools. The Convention acted on these principles in providing, as it did in the new Constitution, for the support of Public Schools. It was estimated that from the sources specified in the new Constitution, the amount that could be certainly raised for school purposes, would be about three hundred and two thousand dollars. If the people and the tax collectors do their duty, the provisions of the new Constitution will produce more money for the support of Public Schools than has heretofore been expended in actual teaching. The Convention has saved at least fifty thousand dollars per annum in abolishing the School Board, and limiting the amount to be paid for officers to four per centum of the school fund, thus leaving ninety-six per centum to pay teachers. The poll tax collected in each county is to be kept in each county, and applied there to Public Schools. The failure to collect more of the poll tax is chargeable to the tax collectors. There are in the State over two hundred thousand voters, and the amount of poll taxes collected has not reached more than seventy-five thousand dollars per annum. As each county would be entitled to its own poll tax, the people in each township, and especially the Trustees, will give special attention to the payment of the poll tax, and it is believed that this change will add at least seventy-five thousand dollars per annum to the school fund. If any fear that the new Constitution has impaired the Public Schools, in not providing a sufficient fund to support them, exists, such apprehension must be dispelled by the first section of the twelfth article, which provides that "the General Assembly shall establish, organize, and maintain a system of Public Schools throughout the State, for the equal benefit of all children between the ages of seven and twenty-one years." The Convention gave every dollar that could be spared at this time for Public Schools, and if it is found that the system is likely to suffer for want of more money, the General Assembly has the full authority to appropriate as much as the people demand to answer all such purposes. The people pay the taxes, and elect their own representatives, and if the Public Schools languish and die for the want of money, it will be the fault of the people and their representatives, and not that of the new Constitution.

Taking the above as a fair statement of what is aimed at by the present Democratic rulers of Alabama, it will be seen that, according to their own showing, the school fund has been systematically reduced from $610,627, in 1872, the last year of Republican administration, to about $450,000, in 1874-5, and is to be still further reduced under the "Constitution framed by your own people," to about $302,000. The poll tax has been reduced to fifty cents, (a fact not objectionable in itself), and the whole amount to be raised therefrom cannot exceed $100,000, and will probably not amount to two-thirds of that sum. The Bourbon estimate itself is therefore not over $380,000 per annum. This, too, with an illiterate population, over the age of ten years, (according to the United States census of 1870), of 283,012 persons; the school population of the State, at the same date, being 336,976, making but little over one dollar per capita, at the present time. New Jersey, with a population of 906,096 in 1870, spent, in 1873-4, $2,471,343 for public schools. Alabama, with a population in 1870 of 996,992, proposes, in 1875, by Constitutional enactment, to spend the munificent sum of $380,000, or thereabouts.

Besides this, the Constitution abolishes the present system of county superintendency, and substitutes therefor the control of Township Trustees. The history of proslavery Alabama has been too pregnant with significant incidents, to allow any one to doubt the intent of this policy. It is hoped that the schools will thereby be handed over to the control of those who do not believe in the education of the labor they aim to control, and who are opposed to taxing the well-to-do for the education of the poor. Besides, the trustee system is a wasteful and incompetent one, anywhere and everywhere, unless it may be rigidly supervised by trained and competent persons, animated by the zeal of the professional educator.

These things are but the natural results of Democratic reaction. They are evidence of the expiring malice of the slaveocracy. No doubt finds place in the minds of sincere and sagacious believers of the final victory of the Free Schools and the principles of Republicanism. But it is well to watch the work of the enemies of liberty and education. "By their fruits shall ye know them."

THE Democrats have suddenly lost their former admiration for Carl Schurz. Last year he was, in their opinion, "the noblest German in America." Now they call him "an unreliable Dutchman." When they thought him an ally of Democracy, he was "the foremost statesman of the age;" now that he has urged the election of Governor Hayes, they consider him "a third-rate statesman," and claim that they kept him at home in Missouri, because they wanted a better man. Schurz was the Democratic idol of yesterday; to-day they are ready to burn him as a heretic. Yet Schurz stands where he always stood—the difficulty being, that he didn't stand where the Democrats thought he did.

OUT of 130,000 persons committed to prison in England and Wales in 1867, only 4,137 could read and write. Our own statistics of crime show clearly that ignorance is our greatest enemy. To guard against it, our Free School System must become general throughout the land. No sectarian influences should be allowed to cripple its usefulness. It should be as impartial as it is free. The future of the Republic depends upon our Free Schools. To multiply and protect these nurseries of freemen requires vigilance on the part of all intelligent citizens, irrespective of party.

THE Memphis Appeal demands "cheap money." The cheapest we know of is the Confederate currency. The Appeal ought to get plenty of that, in Tennessee. It can be purchased by the ton, and as cheap as old rags. "Cheap money" is a new cry.—"Cheap," according to what standard? Our motto is, "Cheap goods, and money worth one hundred cents on the dollar."

THE MEANING OF THE VICTORY.

The redemption of Ohio from Democratic control is something more than an ordinary party victory. It is the triumph of intelligence over ignorance, public virtue over vice, good faith over that reckless spirit which would lead the State and the Nation to repudiate their honest obligations. If the State had gone Republican by only one thousand majority, the victory would have been a grand one, for it would show that the common sense of the majority of the people was sufficient to hold in check those forces of demoralization which have been at work for the past two years. But the majority given for Governor Hayes indicates that the masses of the people are alive to the issues of the hour, and can be relied upon when any great principle, involving National honor or safety, is in danger. Two years of control had given the Democrats an opportunity to entrench themselves. Every State office was held by an active partizan, who used his official influence to protect and advance his party. Democratic office holders were taxed heavily, for the funds needed. Party discipline was rigidly enforced. Every weak point was carefully guarded and strengthened. The best speakers in the Democratic ranks were sent out among the people. All that eloquence and money could do, was done. Golden promises were held out to the working men. They were told, that dull times, and consequent poverty, were the direct results of Republican rule. They were told, that a Democratic triumph would revive business, make money plenty, put food into the mouths of the poor, and increase values of all kinds; while a Republican triumph would depress business, induce poverty among the laboring classes, and, by a shrinking of values, bring about general bankruptcy and ruin. Democratic orators dwelt upon these points—painted the blessings of Democratic rule, and the evils of Republican ascendancy, in strongest contrast; all sunshine, on one side; all darkness and gloom, on the other. Some honest men were deceived, and led to believe that these demagogues were speaking the truth, and that the Democratic party was the only party that could protect the interests of the working men.

But, with the majority, the arts and tricks of the demagogue failed. The people were too intelligent to accept statements for facts, or empty promises for realization. The inflation heresy was weighed and found wanting; the tempting baits offered, were declined; the charges raised against the Republican party, were submitted to the severe test of investigation, and rejected, as without foundation. At all points, on every issue raised, an intelligent comprehension of the wants and necessities of all classes, and the measures needed to supply them, met the paid agents of the Democratic party, and furnished, on the spot, the antidote for the poison they endeavored to introduce.

For this enlightenment of the public mind, we owe much to the Republican press of Ohio. Eloquent speakers have been a power, in the campaign; but the field of their work has been limited. To the free press, of Ohio, holding up, day after day, and week after week, the true issues, and the true principles—dealing heavy blows against entrenched Democracy—watching the whole line of attack, and sending to the remotest sections of the State re-inforcements, in the shape of facts and figures, so that the people could form an intelligent judgment for themselves, we owe the victory that has redeemed Ohio from the rule of Democracy.

All honor to the Republican press of the State!—to those whose pen and voice have helped the good work!—to those who have given time, and money, and hard work, to bring out a full vote!—to all, who, irrespective of party, by word or deed, precept or example, contributed to the glorious result that has sent a thrill of joy throughout the land, all honor!

They have furnished to the Nation an illustration of what intelligent men can do, when aroused by a sense of duty. They have become an inspiration to Pennsylvania and New York, and will exert an influence that will redeem those States from the Democratic thralldom that now oppresses them.

But the work is not all done. Republicans of Ohio must not relax into apathy, or fold their arms, contented with the recent victory. They have other duties to perform. They must show, by wise measures, prudent legislation, honest administration of government, that the people were right in their verdict, and that the Republican party is all that its friends claim it to be—the truest friend of constitutional liberty and good government.

Organization must be kept up, and perfected. What has proven good, must be made better. Every town should have its local organization, and the wisest men should be called to govern it. Every effort should be made to keep down local jealousies—to keep our friends united, so that, next year, Ohio may roll up a majority equal to the one that sent Vallandigham to the shades of obscurity. The victory in 1876, must be worthy of the Centennial year—so complete in its achievements, that the civilized world will unite in saying that the young Republic has taken no step backward, but closes its hundredth year with a government as honestly administered, and with a patriotism as pure, as when it first took its place among the family of nations.

WHO ARE THE TAX-PAYERS?

INTERNAL REVENUES.—For the purpose of showing just where the Internal revenues come from, the following analysis of the tax for 1874 is given. There was collected from—

Spirits	$49,444,089.85
Tobacco	33,242,875.62
Fermented liquors.	9,304,679.72
Banks and bankers.....	3,387,160.67
Penalties, etc.	364,216.34
Adhesive stamps.....	6,136,844.64
Balances.....	764,880.14

$102,644,746.98

If a family uses fifty boxes of matches, of ordinary size, in a year, they pay fifty cents in taxes to support the Government. If they have occasion to use a few bottles of patent medicines; or if the ladies are disposed to indulge in perfumery; or if the head of the family is well-to-do and keeps a bank account, on which he occasionally draws a check, these incidents may occasion an annual expenditure of fifty cents to a dollar in taxes. But this includes the entire list of articles taxed, excepting spirits, beer and tobacco in their various forms. But the latter articles are not included among the necessities of life; they are luxuries. Dealers in these articles not only add the amount of the tax to the cost of their goods, but they fix a profit on the tax itself, in the same proportion as they do on the original price for the article before the tax is added. In other words, the tax pays the same rate of profit as the goods—and yet the consumption increases. The dealer rarely complains of the tax; he makes money out of it, and the slave to artificial appetite pays it all.

CUSTOMS REVENUES.—Free Traders attempt to deceive the people by making them believe the tariff of duties imposed on imported goods is, in all cases, a tax on the consumers of those goods. It is not so. In nine cases out of ten the duties are wholly a tax upon the foreign producer; and he so understands it. Hence the persistent efforts made by Great Britain to secure a reduction of our tariff, and of Canada to obtain a free-trade reciprocity with the United States. It is the producer, not the consumer, who pays the duties. Maine and Canada each send a cargo of potatoes to Boston or New York. They each sell out at $1.00 per bushel. Maine receives the full amount of the sale, while Canada leaves fifteen cents out of each dollar, as a duty on the goods. It is the same with nine-tenths of all the foreign goods brought to United States markets. The duties are paid by the producers, for the privilege of using our markets. It is as direct a tax upon him as the charges for freight, insurance and commissions. The Customs revenues amount to about $175,000,000 a year, of which not less than $125,000,000 are paid by those, outside of the Union, who use our markets for their own advantage.

It is not the brilliant orator, who delights by his silvery tones, that carries conviction, but the earnest man, whose daily walk is a sermon, and whose example is an irresistible power in moulding the opinions of others.

DEMOCRATIC CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF TEXAS.

This body, now in session, has decided, by the vote of its Bourbon majority, that it has the right to legislate generally—that it is within its province to postpone a general election, and to submit or not, as in their sweet will may be determined, whether or not the instrument they frame shall be submitted to the people for ratification. They have already voted to postpone the next general election, and seem inclined to make a tabula rasa of the State and its institutions. Some of the debates are, to say the least, “peculiar” in tone. Here are delegates opposing the right of taxation for school purposes. Another bright talker, of the same school, does not want the “people burdened with the support of charitable institutions.” The Austin State Journal, organ of the Democracy, thinks this sort of thing ill-advised, especially as to the schools, but seems to be by no means sure that the opponents of school taxation are not right, after all. It says: “In going back to elemental principles of free government, we deny that the Legislature has the right to tax the people for making donations of public money to individuals.” But it allows, that school taxes are “justified by a sound public policy.” It is in doubt whether a general fund is or is not necessary, so far as Texas is concerned, because there is a grant of land for that purpose. The fund arising therefrom, it admits to have been abused, and recent State reports show that the Democratic Administration and Legislature have failed, as well as the county authorities, to use the school fund for school purposes.

It may be worth while inquiring what provisions have heretofore been made for the support of common schools. The Republic of Texas, by an Act approved January 26, 1839, granted three leagues of land for the purpose of establishing a primary school or academy. The first Constitution of the State of Texas, adopted in 1845, requires the establishment of public schools, and provides for taxation to support them—one-tenth of the State revenue being devoted to their support, as a perpetual fund.

It confirmed the land grants made under the Republic, which included fifty leagues for the endowment of two Colleges or Universities. The Democratic-Johnson Constitution, of 1866, re-affirmed the preceding provisions. It also provided for the sale of school land to actual settlers; required the Legislature to annually appropriate the amount constitutionally required for the school fund. Taxes paid by colored persons were to be set apart for schools for their children. The Constitution of 1869, framed under the Reconstruction Acts, provides, in addition to re-affirming the foregoing, (all but that relating to colored schools), that there shall be a State Superintendent of Public Schools, elected or appointed for four years. In addition to the permanent fund before provided, it set apart all the proceeds arising from sales of the public lands of Texas, and of a one-dollar poll tax. The fund thus created, to be invested in United States bonds. What the Bourbons have done is not yet clear.

ONE VOTE may save a town office; one vote may save the county ticket; one vote may save the State ticket; one vote may determine whether the State is to have good government or bad, faithful officials or dishonest ones. In view of this possibility, can any citizen, who desires the triumph of just principles, neglect his duty at the polls? Remember that every bad element in the community will be represented at the ballot-box, and will triumph unless intelligence neutralizes their efforts. Give one day at least to the election; urge every respectable man to vote; and, by example, strengthen Republicanism everywhere. The victory will be ours if we but work hard enough to deserve it.

THE enemy are on the run. They have been driven from one stronghold, and on the 2d of November they must be driven from all. Drum up recruits! keep the old flag at the head of the column! bring every man to the front! and the general battle of November will result in a glorious victory for the friends of the Union.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH AT DES MOINES.

The following is the full text of President Grant's speech at the annual re-union of the Army of the Tennessee, at Des Moines, September 29, 1875 :

"Comrades, it always affords me much gratification to meet my old comrades in arms of ten and fourteen years ago, and to live over again in memory the trials and hardships of those days—hardships imposed for the preservation and perpetuation of our free institutions. We believed then, and believe now, that we had a good Government, worth fighting for, and, if need be, dying for. How many of our comrades of those days paid the latter price for our preserved Union! Let their heroism and sacrifices be ever green in our memory. Let not the results of their sacrifices be destroyed. The Union and the free institutions, for which they fell, should be held more dear for their sacrifices. We will not deny to any of those who fought against us any privileges under the Government which we claim for ourselves; on the contrary, we welcome all such who come forward in good faith to help build up the waste places and to perpetuate our institutions against all enemies, as brothers in full interest with us in a common heritage; but we are not prepared to apologize for the part we took in the war. It is to be hoped that like trials will never again befall our country. In this sentiment no class of people can more heartily join than the soldier who submitted to the dangers, trials and hardships of the camp and the battle-field. On whichever side they may have fought, no class of people are more interested in guarding against a recurrence of those days.

"Let us, then, begin by guarding against every enemy threatening the perpetuity of free Republican institutions. I do not bring into this assemblage politics, certainly not partisan politics; but it is a fair subject for soldiers in their deliberations to consider what may be necessary to secure the prize for which they battled in a Republic like ours. Where the citizen is the sovereign and the official the servant, where no power is exercised, except by the will of the people, it is important that the sovereign—the people—should possess intelligence.

"The free school is the promoter of that intelligence which is to preserve us as a free nation. If we are to have another contest in the near future of our national existence, I predict that the dividing line will not be Mason and Dixon's, but between patriotism and intelligence on the one side, and superstition, ambition and ignorance on the other. Now, in this Centennial year of our national existence, I believe it a good time to begin the work of strengthening the foundation of the house commenced by our patriotic forefathers, one hundred years ago, at Concord and Lexington. Let us all labor to add all needful guarantees for the more perfect security of free thought, free speech and free press, pure morals, unfettered religious sentiments, and of equal rights and privileges to all men, irrespective of nationality, color or religion. Encourage free schools, and resolve that not one dollar of money appropriated to their support, no matter how raised, shall be appropriated to the support of any sectarian school. Resolved that neither the State nor Nation, or both combined, shall support institutions of learning other than those sufficient to afford to every child, growing up in the land, the opportunity of a good common school education, unmixed with sectarian, pagan or atheistical tenets. Leave the matter of religion to the family altar, the Church and the private school, supported entirely by private contributions. Keep the Church and State forever separate. With these safeguards, I believe the battles which created the Army of the Tennessee, will not have been fought in vain."

THE Democratic party is anxious to blot out the past. Anxiety is too mild a term. Its followers should pray to have it blotted out, for it contains so much that is shameful, that eternal oblivion would be welcome. But the past will not be forgotten. It is useful as an index to the future. The servant who has proven unfaithful in the past, cannot well be trusted in preference to one who has always been true.

REVIEW OF THE MONTH.

NATIONAL.

...Two events have occurred during the past month, which transcend, by far, the usual importance attached to similar incidents. We refer to the notable speech made by President Grant, at the Des Moines Reunion of the Army of the Tennessee, and to the remarkable political campaign in Ohio, and its victorious termination, on Tuesday, Oct. 12th, by the election of Rutherford B. Hayes over William Allen, as Governor of the new Keystone State of this Union. Elsewhere, the victory, and its meaning, is made the theme of ample comment. But there are noteworthy points to be observed. The vote, though full details are not yet at hand, is an unusually large one, reaching, in all probability, to that cast for Secretary of State, in October, 1872—the year of the last Presidential election. The accompanying table will show, very clearly, the fluctuations for the last ten years, both in the aggregate vote cast, and the various majorities given:

Summary of the Vote of Ohio for Ten Years:

YEAR.	OFFICE.	REPUBLICAN.	DEMOCRATIC.	REP. MAJ.	DEM. MAJ.	TOTAL VOTE.	INCREASE.	DECREASE.
1865...	Governor.....	223,633	193,697	29,936	417,330

1874...	Secretary of State..	221,204	238,406	17,202	459,610	31,119

To the regular votes of 1873 and 1874, must be added the following "parasite" vote, cast by the so-called Liberal and Prohibition parties:

1873.....	20,108
1874.....	7,815
Making the total vote, in 1873.....	448,599
" " " 1874.....	467,425

It seems, from all accounts, that the aggregate vote, cast at the recent election, exceeds 550,000, and will probably foot up over 100,000 more than the total of 1874. If this is the case, the vote with which, as to numbers, it must be compared, is that cast at the October election of 1872, when the Republican majority was 14,150.

Should this prove to be the correct basis for comparison, the next fact established, will be, that the Republican party in Ohio—and, as a corollary, in the country—is once more united. Iowa and Nebraska respond to Ohio, and from the most enterprising city in New Jersey, (Newark,) comes back a responsive cheer. These elections prove the intelligent honesty of the masses; they prove, also, that the PEOPLE will not trust the Democratic party. It was unfaithful in our hour of direst need. For it there is no salvation. It must be resolved back into original elements, and new combinations made thereof. Careful examination will be necessary, before footing up and balancing the Ohio ledger; but, at this writing, the practical result is assured, while the moral triumph, in any event, is greater even than the political one. Republican majority for Hayes, about 4,500; in the State Senate, 5; in the Legislature 12.

...Closely linked with the issues at stake, were the weighty words of President Grant, on the Public School question, and the necessity of its preservation from all sectarian influences. The speech will be found elsewhere, in THE REPUBLIC. One of the more noteworthy facts in relation to its delivery, is the authenticated statements as to its preparation, which come to us from Des Moines. The President, in company with Judge Cole, of the Supreme Court of Iowa, and other gentlemen, during the day, visited the admirable public schools of that city. Great interest was manifested by the President, and animated conversation ensued—Judge Cole presenting, very forcibly, the dangers impending to the common schools of the country from the open hostility expressed thereto by certain religious and political influences—the existence of which is patent, and not denied, though it may be that their present power for mischief is sometimes enlarged. The President expressed himself desirous of presenting his views to the public; and, returning to the residence of Judge Cole at once, the brief but powerful speech which he read to his comrades, in the evening, was prepared. The principles it enunciates—the clear and lucid presentation it affords, of certain underlying ideas, as well as paramount necessities—are so admirably and clearly stated, that it will pass into history with Washington's Farewell Address, and Lincoln's marvelous speech at Gettysburg. The Greeks had a proverb, that "speech is silvern, and silence is golden;" but we may say, that the words of a wise man, habitually reticent, are more valuable than gold or silver. The sentiment, the method, and the occasion, are alike worthy the simple, sagacious citizen-soldier and statesman, whose name, as General and President, is now, and will be through all times, so indissolubly connected with the most memorable events and glories in and of our National history. Ohio, Iowa, and Nebraska respond to the Des Moines speech, and the remaining States, that are to vote in November, will surely fall into line with those which are now at the fore.

THE NOVEMBER AND OTHER ELECTIONS.

...On Tuesday, November 2d, the States of Virginia, West Virginia, Kansas, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Minnesota, Missouri, New York, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin will vote for State officers and members of the State Legislature. There will also be special elections held on the ratification or rejection of the new Constitutions framed by the conventions which have recently adjourned in Alabama and North Carolina. The Texas Constitutional Convention, now in session at Austin, has postponed the State election, which was to have been held in December. In Massachusetts, New York, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Tennessee and Colorado, elections will also be held to fill Congressional vacancies, caused by the death of members-elect from those States. Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Wisconsin and Minnesota are the only States voting for Governor and a full set of State officers. The highest officer on the other tickets, is Secretary of State. There is little or no reason to doubt, that each one of the four candidates nominated by the Republicans, will be elected, nor is there much reason to fear a defeat in any one of the other States, which have heretofore been in the Republican column.

...The September elections placed California, by a Republican division in the main, under Democratic control. Maine, however, remained steadfast. When the roll is called, the result for this campaign will probably be as follows:

Republican States: Maine, Mississippi, Minnesota, Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas.

States Regained: Ohio, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, New York, (probably, New Jersey,) Oregon, (Congressional election) and North Carolina, (popular vote on delegates to Constitutional Convention).

Democratic States: California, (gain), Kentucky, Alabama, Texas, (on Constitutional Convention elections), Missouri, Maryland, (by a less majority than formerly,) West Virginia and Virginia.

This estimate will give the Republicans twelve States, and two other partial victories, 14 in all. The Democrats will gain one, and lose control of six, if not eight other States, in whole or part, coming out with a score of eight in all.

...California held its judicial election on the twentieth of October, and also voted for a Superintendent of Public Instruction.

...Elections were held in Colorado and Oregon on the 25th ult.; in the latter, to fill a vacancy in Congress, caused by the death of Hon. A. L. Dow, Democrat, who was elected last fall by a majority of 302, there being an Independent candidate in the field, who had 6,350 votes. There are now three candidates running for the position, a Democrat, a Republican, and an Independent. The vote in Colorado was simply upon the choice of members of a convention to enact a Constitution, preliminary to the admission of the Territory as a State on the fourth of July, 1876, under the Enabling Act, passed by the last Congress. On the 30th ult., Missouri voted on the new Constitution.

STATE POLITICAL CONVENTIONS.

...Massachusetts is the last State on the roll of nominations. The State Republican Convention was very fitly presided over by the Vice-President of the United States, Henry Wilson, whose presence and opening speech were pledges of harmony in council, and of a high standard of political morality in intent and action. The platform adopted was sound and strong; declaring that the accusation, that the Republican party seeks to keep alive old issues, in order to avoid new ones, is unwarranted. Our past, at least, is secure. Able to review the record, without remorse, we cheerfully commit it to history, and with the courage inspired by success in a noble cause, we address ourselves to the new duties of the era of the Nation.

To that end the Convention pledged itself to support no man "for official position, whose personal character is not an absolute guaranty of fidelity to every public trust." And upon all others, the condemnation of the ballot-box was invoked, no matter the party that may nominate them. Civil service reform was endorsed. In State affairs, the Republicans recognize no privilege of class, no antagonism between labor and capital, but deprecating any attempt to arbitrarily fetter either, they will support such measures as shall develop the resources of both alike; as also all that regards the promotion of temperance, education, good morals, and equal rights, irrespective of sex, the maintenance of order, the honest enforcement of existing laws, rigid economy and retrenchment in every department, and reduction of taxation.

The National expenditures were held up as "a gratifying proof of the earnest endeavors of the Republican party, by economy, frugality, and fidelity in the public service, to lighten the public burden." The President was complimented; the return of peace to the South hailed as a good omen, and it was declared that the party has no more earnest desire, than that the South, without distinction or exception, "may enjoy to the fullest extent those inestimable blessings to which we owe all our own prosperity—universal free education and security of personal rights under local self-government, without the necessity of any interference from abroad."

The following declaration is in harmony with the party expression elsewhere: "That sound reason, as well as the wise and unbroken usage of the Republic, illustrated by the example of Washington, require that the tenure of the Chief Magistracy of the United States should not exceed a second term."

The financial plank obtains new force by the Ohio verdict, and that result will cheer the Republicans of Massachusetts to sustain their opinions by an overwhelming victory:

"That an irredeemable currency is a national evil, and when it continues beyond the necessity of its creation, a national reproach. That the demoralization of values caused by inflation of the National currency, while it tends to place the earnings of labor, which depend on steadiness and uniformity in the measure of value, in the power of speculators in gold and credit, also involves the demoralization of public and private conduct, credit, and expenditure; speculation in the place of thrift; ultimate prostration of trade and industry; risk of increasing crime and dishonor; and the whole train of evils which follow any departure from the homely virtue that keeps its word and pays as it goes."

The closing declaration claims that the Republican party is the one best fitted to carry to a completion the great work it has so well begun and pressed forward. On balloting for Governor, informally, Charles Francis Adams received 236 votes, to 358 for Dr. Loring, and 398 for Alexander H. Rice.

Mr. Adams gained, on the first formal ballot, but Mr. Rice was nominated on the third. The following ticket was put into the field:

For Governor—Alexander H. Rice. For Lieutenant-Governor—Horatio G. Knight. For Secretary of State—Henry B. Pierce. For Treasurer—Charles Endicott. For Auditor—Julius L. Clark. For Attorney General—Charles R. Train.

..The Democrats re-nominated Governor Gaston, and also placed the name of General W. F. Bartlett, present manager of the Tredgar (Richmond, Va.,) Iron Works, a gallant Union soldier and recent Republican, whose animated search for a returning Southern prodigal son, has led him after strange gods, as their choice for Lieutenant-Governor. General Bartlett, however, declines the nomination, but indorses the platform and remaining ticket, which is as follows:

For Secretary of State, George H. Munroe; Treasurer and Receiver, General Weston Howlad; Attorney-General, George F. Verry; Auditor, John E. Fitzgerald.

It is a curious combination. Mr. Gaston was always a Whig, until the Republican party became successful, when he became a mild and uncertain sort of a Democrat. Munroe is the editor of the Saturday Evening Gazette. General Howlad was never known as a Democrat, while Fitzgerald is a brilliant young Irish lawyer of Boston, who is more a Labor Reformer than Democrat. Mr. Verry is a lawyer of ability, who has long wished to come to Congress from the Worcester district; one which is not likely to gratify his aspiration.

The Democratic platform reiterates the declarations of Cincinnati and Baltimore, made in 1872, both as to the Southern acceptance of the war results and finances. It opposes "any further issue by the Government of a currency inconvertible with gold, the world's recognized measure of value," and favors "a speedy return to specie payments, as essential to the revival of the commerce, business and credit of the country, and to the welfare of the laboring classes."

The Republican party and administration is arraigned as corrupt and profligate; the interests of capital and labor are asserted to be identical; prohibition was denounced, and Governor Gaston and General Bartlett complimented. With the exception of the money plank, the platform is but a "plea in avoidance."

...The Labor Reformers met on the 6th inst. Wendell Phillips was nominated for Governor. Mr. Phillips, at the date of his nomination, was in a State Conference of Prohibitionists, supporting the nomination for Governor, of a Mr. Baker. The "Labor Reform" platform confined itself to State issues, demanding legislation on the hours of labor, compulsory education of factory children, &c. The ablest speaker of the movement, Charles McLean, whom the Springfield Republican describes editorially as "a wholesome, white-headed, clean-shaven man," to whom was due the nomination of a ticket, "is quite intelligent, has read a good deal, and is a really powerful speaker. He is a 3-65er, and the author of a resolution, invoking Kelleyism and denouncing the banks."

There were not over twenty-five persons present, and the chief interest grew out of the feeling aroused by the Fall River excitement. Mr. Phillips has not taken any public notice of the nomination.

OTHER CONVENTIONS.

...In Maryland, the Republicans have united their efforts with those of the new "Citizens Reform" movement, and agreed to support the following ticket:

For Governor, J. Morrison Harris; Attorney-General, S. Teakle Wallace; Comptroller, Edward Wilkins. Mr. Harris was a Whig member of Congress at the breaking out of the rebellion, and a Union man. Mr. Wallace is a distinguished member of the Baltimore bar. He was a Whig up to the Lincoln campaign, and cast his first Democratic vote for John C. Breckinridge for President. Mr. Wilkins was formerly a Whig, and afterward a prominent Republican. They have all consented to run. The resolutions declare in favor of an honest and economical administration of the Government, both State and National; of the fulfilment of every pledge as to the payment of State and Federal obligations; of the return to specie payment at the earliest practicable moment, and the cessation of all further expansion of the currency.

...A State Temperance Convention was held in New Jersey, which agreed to place a party ticket in that field.

...The colored people of Georgia convened a Delegate Convention at Augusta, on the 8th and 9th ult., to consider their condition, and the necessary remedies to be had for the wrong they endure. Messrs. Belcher, Turner, Long, Simm, and other leading colored men were present. Heated and somewhat acrimonious debates ensued over a proposition of Mr. Turner to support wholesale migration to Africa, which was lost.

An emigrating bureau was appointed to gather information of the best localities inside the State of Georgia, for the negroes in the so-called insurrection counties to emigrate to. An address was adopted, stating that there was no foundation for the insurrection reports, that they were gotten up by the Bourbon Democracy for political effect, and that the colored people of the State have no idea of rebellion. It also states that colored citizens are not given their rights, that the Ku-Klux are rampant in Georgia, colored men are not allowed to sit in juries, and that they do not receive the protection of the courts.

...The North Carolina Constitutional Convention adjourned on the 11th ult., after a session of thirty-one working days. In the last days, important ordinances were passed, amounting to a general emancipation of the legislature from restrictions embodied in the present Constitution, and giving it larger powers. The public debt question was not interfered with. Several ineffectual attempts were made to repudiate the special tax bonds. North Carolina Democrats differ with their brethren in Alabama and Missouri, in that the latter do materially restrict the powers of the legislature. Probably the Convention so manipulated the apportionment as to feel sure of carrying that body. It makes a difference where the shoe pinches.

...An interesting convention was held at Vicksburg, Miss., Oct. 2d and 3d. It comprised delegates from Missouri, Arkansas, Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, and from nearly all the river parishes of Louisiana, besides a State delegation appointed by the Governor, of whom Gen. Longstreet was one. Senator Bogy, of Missouri, was elected President, and resolutions were adopted, declaring, that the Mississippi river is national in its character, and as such, the care of it belongs to the General Government. That all improvements upon the Mississippi river, and all works necessary for the reclamation and protection of its alluvial basin, should be made by and at the cost of the General Government. That such works should be based on the reports of the U. S. Engineer Commission, made during the last session of Congress; that aid should be given the riparian States for this purpose, and that the Convention appoint a committee to bring the subject before Congress.

...A Woman's Congress met at Syracuse, New York, on the 14th ult., and remained in session for some days. Among other noted ladies in attendance were, Mrs. Livermore, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, Mrs. Dall, Mrs. Croly, Miss Mitchell, of Vassar College, the president of the congress, Miss Willard, of Chicago, formerly lady principal of the Northwestern University, Miss Anna C. Brackett and Miss Louisa Alcott. Woman's suffrage was not allowed, but the topics considered were as follows:

1. Education and Hygiene—which is divided into Kindergartens, the Teacher's Office and Position, Scientific Education, Women on School Boards, and Health of American Girls;
2. Professions and Employments, Places Open to Women, Statistics of the Woman Ministry, and of Women in Journalism;
3. Art of Living, the Ideal and Practical in American Life, Household Art and Decoration, Kitchen Chemistry, the Progress of Art as a Medium of Civilization, Ethics and Æsthetics of Dress;
4. Finance, Uses of Money, What Practical Measures will Promote the Financial Independence of Women;
5. Charity and Reform, Vicarious Beneficence, Offices of Women in the Reform of Criminals of their Own Sex, Women on the Boards of Reformatory Institutions;
- 6.

The Relation of Women to the Legal and Educational Provisions of the Country, Women as Guardians of our Educational Liberty, Limits of Personal Responsibility, and, finally. Efforts of Progressive Women in Europe, Statistics of the Condition of Women in this Country, and Superfluous Women! A dainty set of dishes to be before an assemblage of queens.

INTER-AMERICAN AFFAIRS.

...One of the most notable signs of progress recently seen, is the fact that a compact has been drawn up between Nicaragua, Guatemala, and Salvador, to unite and form one national government. It was not yet known whether Honduras and Costa Rica would join in the movement, but it is to be sincerely hoped that they will—especially the former. Such a federation would greatly facilitate the growth of Central America, and bring peace by example and influence at least, to the disorderly affairs of the United States of Columbia. This movement was first commenced in 1823, when the Spanish yoke was thrown off. The Federal Union continued till 1839, sixteen years, when it was mutually dissolved. The new movement began in 1872, and is now consummated. The population of the new Confederation is, 2,180,000, and the area is 106,289 square miles. With the accession, which seems probable, of Honduras and Costa Rica, there would be a total population of 2,665,000, and an area of 174,880 square miles. Its geographical position must give it importance, and with a general union, the Central American Federal Republic must be at once a leading power.

...President Lerdo gives an interesting resume of the condition of our sister Republic, Mexico, in his message to the new Congress, which convened in September. He spoke in terms of cordial encouragement in relation to the progress of its institutions; declared that the subject of public education should receive special attention, and announced that internal improvements were going on, and the harbor works at Mazatlan, Tampico and Frontera progressing in a satisfactory manner. Judges of the Supreme Court have been elected, and the branches of that body will be reorganized at an early date. The United States Government and people have only one desire in regard to Mexico, and that is that a speedy and amicable end may be made to all causes which, on the Rio Grande border, are so likely to disturb the peace of both countries.

...A report comes by way of Paris, published as correspondence from Madrid, in a usually well-informed French paper, La Memorial Diplomatique, to the effect that our Minister at Madrid, Mr. Cushing, had been instructed to notify the Spanish Government that the United States would feel compelled to recognize the belligerent rights of the Cuban republicans, after the close of the present year, unless effectual steps were taken to suppress the rebellion before that date by the Spanish authorities. It may safely be stated that no action in the form and manner indicated has been taken by Minister Cushing or directed to be done by the State Department. Yet it may also be stated that Cuban affairs are approaching a culmination, which action on the part of the United States in favor of peace and humanity, can largely accelerate. In the meanwhile the patriots' forces are more than usually active, and for the first time they are in possession of field artillery.

THE working man needs honest money. This means money that is worth just what it calls for on its face. The Republican party is pledged to make the greenback worth 100 cents on the dollar, by 1879. The Democratic party would adopt a policy that would lessen its value yearly. Can the honest citizen hesitate in making choice between the two policies—the one that appreciates the value of our paper, the other that depreciates it?

THE Republicans of New York are sanguine of success, this fall. The Liberals are back, and the party is united. Throughout the State, the old camp-fires are burning brightly, and the meetings held denote genuine enthusiasm among the people. We say to our friends in New York, as we have said to our friends in Ohio, bring out a full party vote. This, in the Empire State, means victory for the Republican ticket.

THE NEW NATIONAL BANKS.

The Comptroller of the Currency reports that eighty-three National banks have been organized since the passage of the Act of January 14, 1875, with a capital of $9,234,000, and to which circulation has been issued amounting to $3,023,730. The total amount of additional circulation issued since the passage of the Act is $10,218,000, issued as follows:

To Pennsylvania.....	$1,740,000
To West Virginia.....	114,000
To Kentucky	369,000
To Ohio	234,000
To Indiana	331,000
To Illinois	100,000
To Iowa.....	121,000

The total amount of legal-tender notes deposited for the purpose of retiring circulation from the passage of the Act of June 20, 1874, to October 1, 1875, is $25,042,749, of which amount $7,700,000 has been deposited as follows :

By New York.....	$605,000
By Massachusetts.....	364,000
By Connecticut.....	322,000
By Pennsylvania.....	618,000

By Illinois.....	963,000
By Iowa.....	600,000
By Michigan.....	600,000
By Wisconsin.....	600,000

The amount of National bank circulation outstanding to-day is $2,000,000 less than on June 20, 1874, and $4,000,000 less than on January 14, 1875. The amount outstanding to-day is $347,863,742.

CALLING IN THE BONDS.

Acting Secretary of the Treasury has issued the following notice: By virtue of the authority given by the Act of Congress, approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the public debt," I hereby give notice that the principal and accrued interest of the bonds hereinbefore known as "five-twenty bonds" will be paid at the Treasury of the United States, in the city of Washington, on and after the 1st day of January, 1876, and that the interest on said bonds will cease on that day. That is to say, bonds of the Act of June 30, 1864, as follows:

COUPON BONDS.

$50—No. 3,301 to No. 3,700, both inclusive.
 $100—No. 10,501 to No. 12,000, both inclusive.
 $500—No. 15,301 to No. 18,000, both inclusive.
 $10,000—No. 59,701 to No. 68,000, both inclusive.

REGISTERED BONDS.

$50—No. 69 to No. 150, both inclusive.
 $100—No. 601 to No. 1,000, both inclusive.
 $500—No. 482 to No. 750, both inclusive.
 $1,000—No. 2,651 to No. 4,900, both inclusive.
 $5,000—No. 1,551 to No. 2,100, both inclusive.
 $10,000—No. 3,751 to No. 4,600, both inclusive.

Of the amount outstanding embraced in the numbers as above, $2,500,000 are coupon bonds, and $2,500,000 are registered bonds. United States securities forwarded for redemption should be addressed to the Loan Division, Secretary's Office, and all registered bonds should be assigned to the Secretary of the Treasury for Redemption. The call printed above is the 28th in order since the Government began the cancellation of the old issue of United States bonds. The calls of the Treasury now outstanding for 5-20 six per cent. bonds to be presented for redemption, fall due as follows:

Five-twenties of 1862.		Five-twenties of 1864.
Oct. 14....	$10,000,000	Nov. 3....	$10,000,000
Oct. 28....	14,807,200	Dec. 1....	13,000,000
		Dec. 14....	5,000,000
Total....	$24,897,200	Jan. 1....	5,000,000
		Total....	$33,000,000

The called bonds of the issue of 1862 are of the coupon class, nearly all of them being held in Europe. Of the issue of 1864, about $12,700,000 are of the registered class, chiefly held in this country.

SHOAL WATERS IN THE PACIFIC OCEAN.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
 WASHINGTON, October 5, 1875.

To Collectors of Customs and others:

The Surveyor of Customs at San Francisco, California, Giles H. Gray, reports to the Department, in a communication of the 11th ultimo, that he was informed by Captain James G. Coffin, of the American schooner "Florence Bailey," on his recent arrival at that port from Tahiti, that, at one o'clock P. M. Sunday, August 15, he passed a shoal spot about two hundred feet square in latitude thirty-seven (37) degrees thirty-six (36) minutes North, longitude one hundred and twenty-five (125) degrees eighteen minutes West. The water was very clear, and every sea that came along broke on it. Its distance from the vessel was about one hundred yards, and the shoal was plainly visible.

Collectors of Customs are requested, so far as it may conveniently be done, to bring the substance of this communication to the notice of the masters of vessels navigating the Pacific.

CHAS. F. CONANT,

Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

HOW TO PRESERVE THE IDENTITY OF GOODS ENTERED IN BOND.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 5.

The rules prescribed by the Department on the 5th of April, 1872, for preserving the identity of goods entered in bond, upon which allowance of damage may be made, are hereby amended, as follows:

RULE 1.—Before the damage warrant shall be signed, the Withdrawal Entry Clerk shall be required to place the words "Damage application made," (with date,) in red ink, across the bond account in the ledger.

RULE 2.—The damage return made by the Appraiser shall describe specifically the goods, or packages of goods, upon which damage has been allowed, by setting forth the respective marks and numbers on such packages.

If, however, no distinguishing marks, numbers or devices shall be found on any damaged articles or packages, by which each of them can be identified, or where goods are marked and numbered as it is termed in "chops," one mark or number covering a certain number of packages, it shall be the duty of the officer examining for damage allowance to cause serial numbers to be placed on such articles or packages, (except in cases of wrecked goods, and where the whole invoiced quantity shall, upon examination, be found to be damaged,) which numbers shall be carried on the damage return, and described therein as the "Examiner's damage allowance number." Where the packages are marked and numbered in "chops," especial care will be taken that the Examiner's damage-allowance numbers shall be so placed on the packages that they will not be confounded with the shipper's numbers.

RULE 3.—The Appraiser will make his damage return in duplicate to the Collector, who shall thereupon transmit one copy thereof to the Storekeeper having charge of the warehouse where the goods covered by such damage return are stored.

RULE 4.—It shall be the duty of the Storekeeper receiving such damage returns to file the same, first giving them serial numbers.

The Storekeeper will also note on his books the fact that damage has been allowed on an invoice of goods, where such is the case, as also the number of the damage return on his files.

RULE 5.—The original warehouse entry, when liquidated, must show specifically the different articles or packages on which damage has been allowed.

RULE 6.—Where damage has been allowed on an importation of goods, or any part thereof, every permit for the withdrawal from warehouse of only a part of such importation shall exhibit, by items, on what goods, if any, covered by such permit, damage has been allowed. The percentage of damage need not, however, be stated in the permit.

RULE 7.—Export entries and export permits will be considered as covering only sound goods, unless the contrary shall specially appear.

RULE 8.—The Export Clerk, before passing a withdrawal entry for export, shall require that such entry shall describe the goods by the marks and numbers on the packages in detail, and will also particularly observe whether the words "damage application made" are recorded in the ledger account; and, should such be the case, he will procure the original liquidated warehouse entry, with the damage warrant attached, and if, upon inspection of these documents, he shall ascertain that the export entry covers no goods upon which damage has been allowed, or, if covering damaged goods, that only such as are specified in the permit have been delivered for exportation, and, if the Storekeeper's certificate, prescribed in rule 9, has been received by him, he will pass such entry; otherwise, he will refuse to pass the same.

RULE 9.—The Storekeeper, on receipt of a permit for delivery from warehouse for exportation of only part of an importation, will ascertain, by reference to his books, whether any damage has been allowed on such importation, and, if such be the case, he will take especial care, by reference to the duplicate damage return in his possession, that no goods, on which damage has been allowed, are delivered on such permit, unless the permit shall call for damaged goods, in which case he will see to it that only the particular goods so called for are delivered. On request of the exporter, the Storekeeper will forthwith furnish him a certificate of the delivery from warehouse of sound or damaged goods, as the case may be, describing the goods damaged by the marks and numbers in the damage return.

It is particularly enjoined upon Storekeepers and Warehousemen that they are not to deliver for exportation any goods upon which dam- age has been allowed, unless the permit shall call for damaged goods, identifying them in the manner hereinbefore provided.

RULE 10.—Packages containing goods on which damage allowance has been made, will not hereafter be stencilled with the word "Damaged," or with the percentage of the damage, and all rules and regulations requiring such stencilling are hereby revoked.

CHAS. F. CONANT,
Acting Secretary.

OPERATIONS OF THE MINT.—PREPARING TO COIN SILVER TO REDEEM THE FRACTIONAL CURRENCY—INCREASED DEMAND FOR THE TRADE DOLLAR.

The Act of January 14, 1875, to provide for the resumption of specie payments, authorizes and requires the Secretary of the Treasury, as rapidly as practicable, to cause to be coined at the mints of the United States, silver coins of the denomination of 10, 25, and 50 cents, and to issue them in redemption of an equal amount of fractional currency of similar denominations. Dr. Linderman, Director of the Mint Bureau, is now engaged in perfecting measures for the coinage of such pieces to enable the Secretary to carry out the plan. The total amount of fractional currency shown by the books of the Treasury Department to be now in circulation is $40,783,575, and it is estimated that of this amount, $12,000,000 are in 10-cent notes; $1,500,000 in 15-cent notes; $2,000,000 in 5-cent notes; $10,000,000 in 25-cent notes; and $15,000,000 in 50-cent notes. Hence, it will require 120,000,000 dimes to retire the fractional currency notes of that denomination, and, with the present operations of the mints, two years will be required to coin them alone, unless the coinage of all other pieces be suspended and the whole force be assigned to work upon them. Forty millions of quarters will be required to replace 25-cent notes, and thirty million half-dollars to replace the 50-cent notes. It is believed, however, that at least $8,000,000 of the fractional currency has long since been worn out while in circulation, and will never be presented for redemption. At the Philadelphia Mint the principal work is on small silver coin; but at the San Francisco and Carson City Mints, gold coinage is being forwarded as rapidly as is possible, on account of the great demand for coin on the Pacific coast. At the Assay Office, in New York, refining operations have been somewhat restricted on account of the extensive alterations and repairs required to remedy the damage done the building, and to enlarge the capacity of that establishment.

After the failure of the Bank of California the demand for trade dollars was greater than before, and much time has been occupied at the mints in coining them. The reason for the increased demand is explained by the fact that the Chinese residents of the Pacific coast, after the failure of that bank, transacted all their business with the trade dollar, and used nothing but coin for remittance, fearing to purchase drafts, and thus risk the loss of money, should other failures follow. Confidence has been re-established since the bank resumed business.

Dr. Linderman will not submit his report upon the location of the proposed Mississippi Valley Mint, to Secretary Bristow, until the latter part of November, by which time he expects to have replies to the inquiries submitted by him to various boards of trade and commercial organizations, as to the private capital employed in their respective cities, their trade with the bullion-producing States and Territories, rates for export, and the ordinary labor and means of communication with the bullion-producing districts.

DANGEROUS COUNTERFEITS.

The Comptroller of the Currency issued the following circular on the 4th of October:

Dangerous counterfeits are in circulation of the denomination of $5 of the following banks: The first National Bank of Chicago, Ill.; the Traders' National Bank of Chicago, Ill.; the First National Bank of Paxton, Ill.; the First National Bank of Canton, Ill. Nearly the entire amount of the genuine $5 notes of these banks has been withdrawn from circulation, and no additional issues will be made. The Comptroller is desirous of retiring the whole amount from circulation, and National banks are requested to transmit to the Treasury for redemption all such notes as may come into their possession.

THE NATION'S RECOGNITION OF HEROISM.

The ten gold medals to be presented to the persons who manned the life and fishing boats and rescued 32 persons from the wreck of the steamer Metis in Long Island Sound on the 31st of August, 1872, were to-day received by the Acting Secretary of the Treasury from the Mint. By the Act of February 24, 1873, Congress appropriated $1,600 to enable the President to award these medals, and they have been struck at the Philadelphia Mint. They are of pure gold, about two inches in diameter, the intrinsic value of each being $140. The obverse represents the scene of the disaster off Watch Hill Light, and upon the reverse is the name of the person to whom presented. Each medal is inclosed in a neat case, opening so as to show either side. The President has given directions that they be sent immediately to the persons for whom they are intended, and they will be forwarded accordingly to Capt. J. S. Crandall, Albert Crandall, Daniel F. Larken, Frank Larken, Byron Green, John D. Harvey, Courtland Gavitt, Eugene Nash and Edward Nash, who saved the 30 persons from that wreck. The gold medal to be presented to John Horn, jr., of Detroit, for his heroic exploits in rescuing 21 persons from drowning in the Detroit River, at various times, is also to be immediately presented.

CONTRACTION OF NATIONAL BANK CIRCULATION.

The contraction of the National banking circulation, Oct. 6 and 7, exceeded $1,000,000. The Third National Bank of St. Louis surrendered $400,000; the State National Bank of New Orleans, $405,000; the First National Bank of Denver, $150,000; the Central National of Chicago $45,000, and the National Bank of Jefferson, Texas, $45,000. The weekly surrender of bank circulation is on the increase.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

ORDER REGARDING THE ISSUING OF ANNUITIES TO THE INDIANS.

Acting-Secretary Cowan sent, (Oct. 10.) the following dispatch to the Indian Agent at Standing Rock; also, to the Agents of the Sioux Indians:

"You are hereby instructed not to issue annuities to any Indians belonging to your agency, unless they have been counted. Hold them to this requirement, even if they do not get any annuities until spring. This order is imperative, and leaves you no discretion in the matter."

c-

PENSION OFFICE FILES.

In consequence of the crowded state of the Seaton building, now occupied by the Pension Bureau, and of the danger, in case of fire, of the records of the Pension Office being destroyed, the Commissioner has ordered the removal of the mail division from the rooms they now occupy, on the first floor, and the files of the office stored in these rooms. They are to be placed upon trucks, so they can be wheeled out immediately, in case of fire. Most of these files are stored in the upper stories of the building, and could never be replaced, if destroyed. The Commissioner has done a wise thing, in ordering their removal to the ground floor.

WAR DEPARTMENT.

NEW SIGNAL SERVICE TELEGRAPH.

The Signal Service telegraph line, from Wilmington to Southville, N. C., authorized by the last Congress, is completed and ready for business. A cautionary signal station has been already established, at the latter point, for the benefit of the coast shipping interests.

NAVY DEPARTMENT.

NEW MOTIVE POWER.

Chief-Engineer Wood, of the Navy Department, has invented a new motive power, which he will exhibit at the Centennial. The power consists of carbonic acid gas, which is obtained by means of electricity and galvanism. A caveat has already been granted. Meanwhile, no application has been made for a patent for the Keely motor.

GENERAL POST OFFICE.

THE FAST MAIL TRAIN.

WASHINGTON, OCT. 10, 1875.

Reports to the Post-Office Department show that the fast mail trains have already practically superseded the express companies in carrying newsdealers' packages. The amount of these packages has become so great that railway postal clerks have been detailed to assort them at the New York office before they are delivered to the postal cars. This fact will undoubtedly furnish the express companies with another grievance, next winter.

MAIL EXPENSES WITHIN THE APPROPRIATION.

During the month of September, the cost of the mail service of the country was increased, by the organization of new routes, $100,851.43, and was decreased, by discontinuance of routes, $51,568.03, leaving a net increase of $49,283.40. The appropriation for mail service, available on the 1st of July, 1875, was $18,000,000. The contracts for mail service, at this date, amount to $15,773,111.54, leaving $2,226,888.46 yet available to establish new routes when needed.

U. S. SUPREME COURT.

THE HEAVY SUPREME COURT CALENDAR.

The Fall term of the Supreme Court of the United States was commenced Monday, Oct. 11. The number of cases on the calendar is now 666, more than one hundred greater than ever before, at the beginning of a term. The importance of devising some way to relieve the Supreme Court of a part of the business is, every year, becoming more apparent.

The Republican press throughout the country are doing splendid service for the good cause. Our exchanges show a unity of sentiment on the leading issues of the day, as remarkable as it is pleasing. This is right. In union there is strength. Republicanism means the same thing everywhere; good government; free schools; honesty in all things, in trade as well as in politics; a sound currency; protection to the citizen, everywhere; civil and religious liberty throughout the length and breadth of the land. Local issues may prevail, but when national interests are at stake, all are united. Thanks to the Republican press for the example set. It is all powerful for good. It has worked out the salvation of Ohio. It will secure the redemption of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania.

The people can be trusted. Their common sense is proof against the arts and tricks of the demagogues. Place the true facts before them, and their intelligence and patriotism can be depended upon for the right result.

A SNARE FOR THE PUBLIC.

The house of Appletons, in the city of New York, having attained some distinction in the country, is in a position to use its money and reputation for sinister purposes with very great effect. This is the publishing house which, within a few years past, has been employing various writers to remodel history in the interest of the Roman Catholic Church. Now, in this national crisis, probably with an eye to its own benefits as well as to promote the interests of Mr. Tilden and the Democratic party, it has just issued what is styled a compilation of the proceedings in "the Presidential count." It is an octavo volume of 670 pages, and ought to be denounced by every candid and unbiased man as a monstrous piece of pettifogging from the beginning to the end. In one word, it is a special and elaborate plea for the counting in of Mr. Tilden as President of the United States for the next four years. We propose to take a few specimens from this compilation in proof of this assertion :

On pages x and xi, under the title, "Temporary expedient for the first counting in 1789," after citing the record of the proceedings of that date, which clearly show that the President of the Senate was to count the votes, it proceeded to pettifog the case, and winds up by saying, "in the nature of the case what was done on that occasion can have no authority as a precedent."

On pages xi and xii a list is given of the resolutions of the two houses of Congress providing a mode of procedure in the several counts, and an argument is then attempted to show that the power to count the votes is in Congress, because Congress has on these several occasions assumed that power. The fallacy of this is seen at once. The assumption of authority does not prove the right of such assumption. It may be usurpation, and in all these cases is such. The Constitution nowhere gives to Congress the right to count the votes.

In the same connection is another piece of special pleading as to the function of the tellers. This compilation says, "the votes were counted by the tellers," "and there never has been any different practice, and no different practice could have arisen under the Constitution. The two houses in convention have from the first until now counted the votes." This is quoted as the language of Senator Boutwell, and commented upon with approval, without so much as ever alluding to the form of certificate issued by some of the early Presidents of the Senate, in which it is distinctly declared that the President of the Senate did open the certificates and count the votes. This is a vile case of the suppressio veri.

On page xiii, after having shown that the tellers were: "1, To make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; 2, The result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate," this compilation goes on to argue that the tellers are to read the certificates and count the votes. It makes the point that the President of the Senate cannot pretend to govern or in any manner interfere with the counting.

On page xiv an attempt is made to show that "the two houses of Congress have all the power of verification of the electoral votes and their results which the Constitution and the laws supply or allow." Whereas, the two houses have no such Constitution or statutory power whatever, and any pretension of the kind is a gross usurpation of power.

On page xv, under the head of "Presiding at the joint meeting," this compilation attempts to show that the President of the Senate has no right even to occupy the Speaker's chair save by the courtesy of the House when he comes to open the certificates in the presence of the two houses! so minute is the point of hostility shown in this compilation to any grant of power or authority to that officer. There seems all the way along to be a special spite against the President of the Senate, as though he were to be held up to public reproach, because the Constitution of the country directs him to "open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted."

On page xx the conclusion of this famous compilation is that "as precedents to sustain the President of the Senate in assuming power to count the votes in the sense merely of enumerating the votes and still more in the sense of adjudicating on the authenticity and the validity of the votes, the certificates are utterly worthless." This is supposed to be a fair and impartial compilation, but on every page we may see how completely partisan it is. If there had been a disposition of fairness in any sense whatever, these heated partisan comments would have been omitted.

Again, an attempt is made to show that the action of Mason, the President of the Senate in 1857, in counting the vote of Wisconsin, was not an assumption of power on his part to decide whether the vote of Wisconsin should be counted or not. And yet the fact is that Mason did count the vote of that State, and it was so announced in the final result. Can anything be more partisan than such an attempt as this?

On pages xxi to xxxiii are to be found an enumeration of the different counts, with a constant attempt to show that the tellers counted the votes, and not the President of the Senate. But this compilation fails to state that the tellers counted only such certificates as were handed them by the President of the Senate, and only such as were found to be correct according to the Constitution and the laws, and that the duties of the tellers were only clerical.

On page xxxiii an attempt is made to explain the status of an elector who was ineligible under the provision of the Constitution—but no notice is taken of the laws of States by which such a defect is to be cured. Here is another gross example of the suppressio veri!

On page xxxiv a piece of special pleading is employed to show that "making a list of the votes" by the tellers, is the same as "counting the votes," the whole object being to support the assumed right of the two houses by their clerks, the tellers, to count the votes.

On page xxxvi a statement is made to this effect: Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, said, "Do I understand the Chair to decide that Congress in any form has power to decide on the validity or invalidity of a vote?" The Presiding Officer answered: "The Presiding Officer has made no such decision." And yet the compilation goes on to argue that Congress has this right.

On pages xli and xlii a summary from the foregoing materials is made up, concluding that exclusive jurisdiction of the count is with Congress—that the President of the Senate has no power to count the vote or to decide any material question in regard to it—that the two houses of Congress have asserted the right to manage and provide for the count in their own discretion, and that Congress can legislate upon the subject.

But it fails to show how Congress, any more than the President of the Senate, has the right, under the plain provision of the Constitution, to reject the vote of any State from the count.

This compilation, on pages xliii to liv, gives a list of opinions on the right of the two houses to count the vote. It cites the statements of Messrs. Sherman, Boutwell, Morton, Dawes, Thurman, Logan, Trumbull, Frelinghuysen, Conkling, Christiancy, Eaton, Maxey, Howard, Davis, Stewart, Reverdy Johnson, Edmunds, Cowan, Bingham, Marshall, Hunter, Butler, Hale, Clay, Callamer, Randolph, Toombs, A. P. Butler, Stuart, Orr, Wright, and Whyte, with a number of precedents and votes of Senators and Congressmen on bills of 1800, 1875, and 1876. But while all this can go for what it is worth, being nothing more than a summary of opinion upon a case where there is a concurrence of action in the two houses, it is admitted over and over again that the language of the Constitution does not in itself expressly determine the right—and in case the two houses fail to agree on the mode of the count, all these opinions and expressions are wholly incompetent and irrelevant.

This compilation then purports, on pages 1 to 413, to give a recital of all the proceedings in each Presidential count, and on pages 414 to 434, a recital of all the proceedings in Congress on a proposal for legislation in regard to the subject of the count in the year 1800, and on pages 435 to 447, on a proposal for legislation on the same subject in 1873, and on pages 448 to 500, on a proposal for similar legislation in 1875, and on pages 501 to 664, on a proposal for similar legislation in 1876, none of which was ever carried into effect, and then this famous compilation, which throughout is intended to blind and mislead the public, shuffles into an appendix at the end—a speech of Senator Bayard, of Delaware, the positions of which, if adopted as sound, must forever dispose of the power of Congress to make any law to control the count of the electoral vote.

Senator Bayard in this speech, delivered in the Senate of the United States, February 25th, 1875, speaking of the Constitution and the law of 1792, says :

“It provided the method of the certification of the results, and it will be observed that not only was the manner of the election of the electoral college confided to each State, but that the certification, the authentication of the electoral vote, was confided wholly and unreservedly by the Constitution to the States. And nowhere is power given to either house of Congress to pass upon the election, either the manner or the fact, of electors for President and Vice President. And if the Congress of the United States, either one or both houses, shall assume under the guise or pretext of telling or counting a vote to decide the fact of the election of electors, who are to form the college by whom the President and Vice President are to be chosen, then they will have taken upon themselves an authority for which I, for one, can find no warrant in this charter of limited powers. This was the belief, and the action of the country has been in accordance with this belief from its foundation till February 6th, 1865. And then, for the first time, did the Congress of the United States assume the authority, by a vote of either house, to put a veto upon the count of a State's vote. That such a rule was without constitutional warrant I cannot doubt, and I do not think I am going too far when I say that the unconstitutionality of that rule is generally admitted.”

After citing the language of the Constitution in regard to electors, Senator Bayard proceeds :

“There is nothing in this language that authorizes either house of Congress or both houses of Congress to interfere with the decision which has been made by the electors themselves and certified by them and sent to the President of the Senate. There is no pretext that for any cause whatever, Congress has any power or all the other departments of the Government have any power to refuse to receive and count the result of the action of the voters in the States in that election as certified by the electors whom they have chosen. That questions may arise whether that choice was made; that questions may arise whether that election was properly held, or whether it was a free and fair election, is undoubtedly true, but there is no machinery provided for contest and no contest seems to have been anticipated on this subject. It is casus omissus intentionally or otherwise upon the part of those who framed this Government, and we must take it as it is, and if there be necessity for its amendment or its supplement, that must be the action of the American people in accordance with the Constitution itself, and I am free to say that some amendment on this subject should be had; but because there is no machinery provided, no tribunal appointed by which this most important issue and contest may be decided as to who was chosen for President and Vice President in any State, that certainly does not justify Congress in assuming either by direct formal claim of the power in the enactment of a law, or by adopting rules which shall give them such power as will be equivalent to the control of the subject; that is to say, a power of veto, which, under the twenty-second joint rule, is given to either house, or under the present bill is to be assumed by both houses acting together. I have been able to find and I believe that there exists no such power either for one house or both."

The above instances of unfairness and the grossest partisanship are but a few of the many which mark the whole tenor of the compilation as one gotten up entirely in the interest of the Democratic party, and with a view to putting the case in the strongest light of which it is capable for the cause of the Democrats at this time. It is safe to say that had not the circumstances been such as they are, no such volume would have been compiled and no such construction given to the power of Congress over the electoral vote. But now because Mr. Tilden needs the help of such a construction in order to count him in, this array of documents and special pleadings and this current pettifogging comment upon them, which runs through the whole volume, has been paraded before the public to mislead and ensnare them.

It ought to be denounced as a most gross, unfair, and partisan trick to deceive the people and to pervert the Constitution and the law in the interest of a hungry party yearning for the spoils of office.

Let the country beware of this attempt to poison the very fountain of truth and justice, and to palm upon the nation a gross imposition under the pretense of a compilation of proceedings in regard to the Presidential count.

THE ELECTORAL VOTE FOR PRESIDENT.

Hon. Galusha A. Grow, at one time Speaker of the House of Representatives, and a gentleman of undoubted ability, has given his views in relation to the power and duty of the President of the Senate, in case the two houses fail to fix upon any concurrent mode of officially ascertaining the result of the late Presidential election. His opinion on this subject is entitled to great consideration.

We give the following extract from his article, published in the New York Tribune of recent date:

"The President of the Senate, as the custodian of the returns and in the receiving and opening, (and in everything that he has to do with them,) is an official created by the Constitution itself for a specific duty, and in its performance he is clearly not the presiding officer (as such) of either house or of the two houses so as to be subject to their directions in any way, except under joint rule or positive law; for he could perform the duty thus assigned him just as well at the clerk's desk as in the presiding officer's chair. The Senate, if the above view is correct, cannot by itself give any specific directions or instructions to the person who receives and opens the returns because it happens to be their presiding officer that the Constitution designates for that duty. Much less can the House, by itself, give any instructions, for the person so designated has no connection whatever with their body.

"The President of the Senate then, when he comes with the returns to be opened and the votes to be counted, comes not as a presiding officer over either or both houses, but he comes as an independent officer of the Government to perform a duty fixed and defined by the Constitution. In the absence of any legislation or concurrent action of the two houses, what is he to do? Under such circumstances, would it be a discharge of his duty to open all the certificates and lay them on the desk in the presence of the two houses and then depart? Certainly it would be if he is only to place them in the possession of the two houses, and then they are to dispose of them by motion and simple resolution.

"In the absence of any legislation or concurrent action of the two houses, how is the mandate of the Constitution to count the votes to be executed unless it is done by the person whom the Constitution has selected to receive and open them?—especially when no one else is specifically directed to do it; and it is neither perversion of language nor forced construction for him to do it. The requirement that the certificates shall be opened in the presence of the Senate and House no more confers the power to count the votes on either house than does a law that requires an election board to conduct a precinct election in the presence of supervisors appointed by the courts to be present confer power on said supervisors to count the votes and declare the result. Yet the board must perform that duty in the presence of the supervisors, who, however, have nothing to do with ascertaining and declaring the vote.

"What votes under this constitutional provision are to be counted? The votes cast by the electors duly authorized to cast the same by the laws of their respective States. If the power to count rests in the President of the Senate, in the absence of legislation, how is he to ascertain who are the electors duly authorized under the laws of the respective States? The same way that the President of the United States would ascertain who is the duly elected Governor of a State in granting the military aid that he is required to furnish in certain cases on the application of the executive of a State. It may be said that if the President of the Senate is to ascertain whether any person has received a majority of the votes of the whole number of electors appointed it would be clothing him with absolute power. If my view is correct, it only clothes him with the powers with which he is invested by the Constitution, and they are no greater and no more absolute than they would be in whoever must determine the result. The power is just as absolute if exercised by either house of Congress, and if there is danger that the result would be controlled by partisan spirit or prejudice, there is the same danger in either or both houses of Congress, for each is composed and made up of individual men with like passions, prejudices, and frailties with him whom the Constitution has selected for a specific act."

Hon. T. I. Coffey, of Pennsylvania, recently Assistant Attorney General of the United States, whose legal ability is well established, has also given his views in the New York Tribune. We have only room for the following extract from his article:

"Surprise has been expressed that the Constitution does not declare by whom the electoral votes shall be counted. The reason plainly is that the counting was intended to be nothing but a clerical computation of numbers read off from the just-opened certificates by any one whom the President of the Senate might designate. If it had been supposed that any question of acceptance or rejection of the contents of the certificates was to be raised or decided, we may safely assume that the Constitution would have intrusted the decision of such question to some other body than Congress. This is apparent from the jealousy exhibited in the convention to the theory of a choice of a President by Congress. The whole electoral machinery was devised in hostility to that theory, and the power to elect a President was only given to the popular branch after that machinery should have failed to do its work. If it had been suggested that for any reason the House of Representatives could pronounce judgment on the appointment, organization, or validity of the votes of the electors of any State, and by refusing to allow such votes to be counted, could draw to themselves the power to elect the President, we may well suppose that careful provision would have been made against such a possibility. A power so subversive of the whole theory and working of the Constitution in the momentous matter of choosing the National Executive cannot be presumed in the absence of any word or warrant for it. If such power is to be found and exercised, we have probably seen our last election of a President by the electoral machinery. If one branch or both branches of Congress may supervise the State action in the appointment of electors, and, for reasons of their own, reject the lawfully authenticated return of such electors, Congress simply becomes a returning board of last resort, without the methods or local knowledge essential to effective investigation, and without the sense of judicial responsibility essential to just judgment. In face of the constant, strenuous, and sagacious hostility of the framers of the Constitution to a control of the choice of the Executive by the Legislative or any other department of the National Government, (except in the contingency of a failure of the States to choose,) this modern claim to such control seems monstrous."

The following argument, in favor of the right of the President of the Senate not only to count the vote but to decide which certificates shall be opened and what votes shall be counted, is from the pen of Mr. John D. Defrees, for many years the editor of the Indiana State Journal:

"The mode of electing a President was more maturely considered by those who made the Constitution than any other question before them. The first proposition was to make him elective by the joint action of the two houses of Congress. There were so many objections to this plan that it was abandoned. One of the principal objections to it was that a President thus elected would be but the tool of the power which had elected him, and which would lead to intrigues and corruptions destructive alike to the independence and dignity of the great office. The electoral college method was adopted as the very best, in their opinion, that could be devised by them. The States were given by the Constitution the power 'to appoint the electors in such manner as the Legislatures thereof may direct.' Congress has no control over their appointment, nor can it in any way interfere with their action. The electoral colleges of each State are as supreme in the performance of their duty as the Congress is in the discharge of its duty. Whenever the electoral colleges of all the States confer a majority of their votes on any one man, he becomes constitutionally the President for the term of four years. From this decision there can be no appeal, because no provision has been made by the Constitution for an appeal to any supreme authority. The only way in which the House can have anything to do in making a President is when the electoral colleges shall fail to give any one man a majority of all the votes given. These views are sustained as well by Judges Story and Kent, the great expounders of the Constitution, as by the common-sense construction of that instrument. After providing for the procedure of the electors and for the certificates of the number of the votes given and for whom given, being sent to the President of the Senate, the Constitution says: 'The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates (of the electors of the several States) and the votes shall be counted, and the person having the greatest number of votes for President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, shall be President.' In commenting on this provision of the Constitution Judge Kent says: 'That the two houses are to be present only as spectators to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, [that is, to see that the votes are correctly added up and announced,] and the House to act only if no choice be made by the electors.' Judge Story, in relation to the same provision, says: 'No provision is made (in the Constitution) for the discussion or decision of any questions which may arise as to the regularity and authenticity of the returns of the electoral vote, or to the rights of the persons who gave the votes, or the manner or circumstances in which they ought to be counted. It seems to have been taken for granted that no question would arise on the subject, and nothing more was necessary than to open the certificates by the President of the Senate in the presence of both houses, and to count the votes as returned.' It seems to me that no man understanding the English language, whether learned in the law or not, can come to any other conclusion.

"The admitted rule for the construction of the Constitution, laid down in Judge Tucker's Commentaries on Blackstone, is 'that it shall be construed strictly in all cases where the rights of the States may be drawn in question, or are involved.' The right of a State to participate in the election of a President, and to have its electoral vote counted as cast and returned by its electors, is a constitutional right which cannot be questioned or disregarded. It cannot be deprived of this right by any act of Congress or any other power. When the Constitution says that the vote of the electors shall be counted, it is absolute and imperative.

"To accomplish partisan purposes, even strict constructionists now contend that the words, 'the votes shall be counted,' imply that they 'shall not be counted,' should objection be made by the House of Representatives; in effect, that the House has a power superior to the Constitution! This they call the doctrine of obtaining power by implication; that is, that the words 'shall be' imply 'shall not be!' As well contend that the word 'white' implies 'black;' that is, 'white' becomes 'black' by implication! To this absurdity are these expounders of the Constitution reduced! A resort to any means by either house of Congress, or by joint action, to prevent the electoral vote of a State being counted would be a usurpation, destructive of the mode established by the convention for the election of a President. Congress would then make the President, a thing which the framers of the Constitution determined it should not do, except where the electoral colleges failed, as provided for in the Constitution.

"Now, as to the recent Presidential election. It is contended by the defeated party that, inasmuch as the face of the returns of the election in Louisiana indicated that a majority of the voters of that State had voted for Mr. Tilden, therefore he should be the next President. Let us look at the facts as they exist. That State has the undoubted right "to appoint electors in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct." The Legislature did direct that the question whether or not the electors were legally elected should be determined by a returning board established by law. For this purpose the board was authorized to inquire whether intimidations and frauds upon the ballot-boxes had taken place previous to or on the day of the election. If from the testimony adduced the board was convinced that such means of carrying on the election had been resorted to, they were compelled by their oaths of office to do just what they did do. It seems from the peculiar condition of affairs in that State the Legislature thought it to be necessary and proper to give this power to the board. I shall not stop to inquire whether or not such power should have been given. That question is not to be considered. It exists, and that is the end of it. The board received the sworn testimony of a great many persons, and were convinced that such a state of facts existed as to justly demand the recognition of the election of the Republican electors. They received the proper certificates of their election, and on the day required cast their votes for Mr. Hayes for President and Mr. Wheeler for Vice President. However diversified opinions may be as to whether the returning board did right or wrong, there is no tribunal fixed by the Constitution by which its acts can be set aside or disregarded.

"The President of the Senate is the legal custodian of the returns of the electoral colleges. It is made his duty to open the certificates in the presence of the two houses of Congress, they being merely the witnesses of the transaction. The counting of the vote, about which there has been so much silly talk, is a mere clerical duty, which may be performed by the Secretary of the Senate or Clerk of the House, or any other persons capable of correctly adding up a column of figures, that may be selected for the purpose. The President of the Senate is bound to know, historically, the result of the action of the electors in each State, so as to decide between true and fictitious or false returns. For instance, were a document presented to him, purporting to be the action of an electoral college of a State, whose only evidence of its authenticity is the certificate of a person known to him to be neither the Governor nor any other officer of that State, he is under no obligation to open it. It may be said that so much discretion should not be intrusted to any officer of the Government. That is not now a debatable question. It has been intrusted to the President of the Senate by the Constitution, and to no one else. It cannot be taken from him except by an amendment of the Constitution.

"Congressional committees have been sent to examine into the circumstances attending the election in several of the Southern States. I shall only speak in regard to Louisiana. On the return of the committees from that State, some of their number may contend that the action of the returning board was right and proper; while others may pronounce it wrong and improper. A part of these committeemen may say that such a state of facts was established by undoubted evidence, as to convince them that men, from whose fingers the blood of murdered Republicans was still dripping, had attempted to forcibly seize the helm of State. Others may say that there have been no assassinations of Republicans for political causes; no dragging of Republicans by the neck until dead, because they were Republicans; that the most perfect order reigned throughout the whole country. To this others may reply that, if so, it is the order that reigned at Warsaw when crushed beneath the iron heel of the Autocrat of Russia; the order of the tomb; the order of the funeral pile; the order which precedes the last convulsive throb of the poor colored man when engaged in commending his soul to his Maker, the victim of the merciless and brutal white fiends who murdered him because of his devotion to the Republican party. All these things may be said, and yet no power can change the action of the legally constituted electoral college of that State, nor disregard or set aside the votes cast by it.

"In 1844 the Whigs had far better reasons to believe that Mr. Polk had been elected over Mr. Clay, by fraud, than the Democrats now have reason to believe Governor Hayes to have been thus elected. The electoral colleges of the several States gave a majority of their votes for Mr. Polk and he was legally elected. The Whigs did not threaten to disregard the votes thus given, nor did they call conventions for the purpose of inciting their friends to bloody resistance to his inauguration. Their devotion to their great leader, the majestic and immortal Henry Clay, was but little short of adoration, and yet they had still greater regard for the Constitution and laws of their country, and they bowed in silent obedience to the supremacy. May we not hope that the 'second sober thought' of those who were beaten in the recent election will induce them to follow so patriotic an example?"

A WORD OF ADVICE.—If Watterson's one hundred thousand unarmed petitioners descend upon Washington before the 4th of March, the soup-houses of the city will be bankrupt in less than twenty-four hours after their arrival. For the sake of the worthy poor we sincerely hope that the trumpet-blowers of Democracy may stay at home. If they must have some active work to keep their blood in circulation, let them get some soap and water and go at the reform movement in earnest.

THE VICE PRESIDENT'S DUTY.-

THE CONSTITUTION REQUIRES HIM TO COUNT THE VOTE.

THE FRAMERS OF THE INSTRUMENT EXPOUND ITS MEANING—THE RESOLUTION WHICH THEY ADOPTED FOR THE INSTRUCTION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS—NO POSSIBLE CHANCE FOR DEMOCRATIC QUIBBLING—CHANCELLOR KENT'S CONSTRUCTION OF THE LANGUAGE—THE PRECEDENTS CONCLUSIVE.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 17.]

Your columns have contained, from time to time, a very able exposition of the pending difficulty in counting and declaring the votes of the electoral colleges for President and Vice President of the United States, and I do not wonder at your deciding that the whole question has been fairly and fully presented, and, therefore, declining further communications on the subject. And yet, knowing, as you do, my long familiarity with constitutional questions, and that I have spent more than half a century in learning how to put a simple question in a manner best calculated to facilitate honest-minded but busy men in arriving at the truth, I hope you will permit me very briefly to review the requirements of the Constitution and the practice under it, as inaugurated by the very men who framed that instrument, and, of course, were the best qualified expounders of their own work.

The Constitution requires as follows :

"The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed," &c.

It will be perceived that this clause does not, in so many words, declare who shall count the votes, but the conclusion is irresistible and a legal inference, that the Vice President, who opens and declares the votes, of necessity counts them, in order that he may declare the result of the election.

On this subject the late Chancellor Kent, than whom there can be no higher authority on the legal construction of language, in his celebrated Commentaries, volume 1, page 227, says :

"The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted. In the case of questionable votes, and a closely-contested election, this power may be all-important ; and, I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result, and that the houses are present only as spectators, to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice be made by the electors."

CONCLUSIVE AUTHORITY ON THE SUBJECT.

But there exists still higher and more conclusive authority in favor of this construction of the Constitution.

After the convention had finished and ordered to be engrossed their draft of the Constitution, and, as it appears, on the very day on which Washington, as their President, transmitted it to the Congress of the Confederacy, then in session, the omission in section 3 of article 2 of that instrument, to specifically name the Vice President as the party who was to count, as well as open and declare the votes of the electoral colleges, became apparent, and they at once proceeded to remedy the omission by the passage of the following resolution, on the 17th day of September, 1787, giving their opinion in regard to what should be the mode of proceeding by the first Congress under the Constitution to be adopted :

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this convention that as soon as the conventions of nine States shall have ratified this Constitution, the United States in Congress assembled should fix a day on which electors should be appointed by the States which shall have ratified the same, and a day on which the electors should assemble to vote for the President, and the time and place for commencing proceedings under this Constitution ; that after such publication the electors should be appointed and the Senators and Representatives elected ; that electors should meet on the day fixed for the election of President, and should transmit their votes, certified, signed, sealed, and directed as the Constitution requires, to the Secretary of the United States in Congress assembled ; that the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned ; that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President, and that after he shall be chosen the Congress, together with the President, should, without delay, proceed to execute the Constitution."

By this act those who framed the Constitution virtually amended it, to gratify the scruples of those who foresaw the possibility of trouble from what might be construed into an omission ; and, consequently, an official construction was put upon their work, after it had left their hands, which made it imperative that the Vice President, or President of the Senate, should count, as well as "open" and "declare" the votes of the electoral colleges.

I might stop here, and with perfect justice declare that this official construction of their own work by the identical body who framed the Constitution, after that instrument had passed from their control, on the 17th of September, 1787, settles the whole question, and that the Constitution, in so many words, makes it the imperative duty of the President of the Senate to "open, count, and declare who has been elected President and Vice President."

ACTION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS.

But let us inquire how the first Congress of the United States assembled under the Constitution understood and obeyed its mandate.

"In the Senate of the United States, at the first session of the first Congress, began at the City of New York, March 4, 1789. Monday, April 15. (Annals of Congress, 1st Cong., vol. 1, pp. 16-18.)

"The credentials of the members present being and ordered to be filed, the Senate proceeded, by ballot, to the choice of a President, for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States.

"John Langdon was elected.

"Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate chamber, to proceed, in the presence of the House, to discharge that duty; and that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table and make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose.

"Mr. Ellsworth reported that he had delivered the message, and Mr. Boudinot, from the House of Representatives, informed the Senate that the House is ready forthwith to meet them to attend the opening and counting of the votes of the electors of the President and Vice President of the United States.

"The Speaker and the members of the House of Representatives attended in the Senate chamber, and the President elected for the purpose of counting the votes declared that the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice President of the United States, which were as follows: * * *

"Whereby it appeared that George Washington, Esq., was elected President, and John Adams, Esq., Vice President of the United States of America.

"Mr. Madison, from the House of Representatives, thus addressed the Senate:

"Mr. President: I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that the House have agreed that the notifications of the election of the President and of the Vice President of the United States should be made by such persons, and in such manner, as the Senate shall be pleased to direct."

To this action of the Senate the response of the House was as follows:

"In House of Representatives, Monday, Feb. 11, 1793. (Annals of Congress, 2d Cong., p. 573.)

"Mr. William Smith, from the committee appointed on the part of the House, jointly with a committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and for other purposes expressed in the resolution of the 5th instant, made a report, which was twice read and agreed to by the House, as follows:

"That the two houses shall assemble in the Senate chamber on Wednesday next, at 12 o'clock; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of this House to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected, to both houses assembled, as aforesaid; which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journal of the two houses."

It will thus be perceived that the Senate of the United States at their first session under the Constitution obeyed implicitly the official construction placed upon that instrument on the 17th of September, 1787, by the very body that framed it, and that their first official act was, "to proceed by ballot to the choice of a President, for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States."

Their second official act was to inform the House of Representatives that they had elected a President "for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice President of the United States;" that they are ready to receive the House in the Senate chamber; and also, that they have appointed one of their members—to do what? "To sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared—submitting to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose."

Mark the fact, that the House is not asked or required also to appoint a teller or tellers as a matter of duty or of importance, implying that they have official and constitutional duties to discharge, but expressly declaring that they are only "to sit at the Clerk's table, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared;" and that the House may or may not, at their pleasure, appoint one or more of their members for the same purpose, and none other.

How ridiculous, then, the attempt to make the tellers important official persons, who have grave and responsible constitutional duties to perform, when in fact they have their origin in a simple act of courtesy on the part of the Senate to the House, and by that body so considered and accepted. The Constitution simply required the presence of the two houses to witness the performance of his constitutional duties by the President of the Senate, but gives neither house of Congress any power over the President of the Senate in the performance of his prescribed duty. The Senate, however, advised the President to notify the Vice President of his election, prescribing the form of the notification to be used, in which the President of the Senate is made to say: "The undersigned, President of the Senate, did, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes for President and Vice President," &c.

THE PROCEEDINGS IN LATER CONGRESSES.

The proceedings at the second and third elections of President and Vice President were in all respects similar to the proceedings at the first election of President, except that at the third election the House of Representatives made an abortive attempt to interfere with the rights of the Senate, and the duties of their President in certifying to the Vice President the fact of his election according to the terms of the Constitution, and in the words of the convention which framed that instrument. This attempt, under the inspiration of the democracy, who had got possession of the House, was speciously covered up by a resolution that the President of the United States, and not the President of the Senate, should hereafter notify the Vice President of his election. The Senate discovered the game of the democracy, and promptly took action as follows:

"In Senate, Feb. 10, 1797.

"Mr. Sedgwick, from the Committee of Conference above mentioned, reported that the following resolution should be adopted by the House of Representatives:

"Resolved, That the notification of the election of Vice President elect be made by such person and in such manner as the Senate may direct.

"On motion [from the House of Representatives] that it be—

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate (in such manner as he shall judge most proper) to the person elected Vice President of the United States, for the term of four years to commence 4th day of March next, information of his said election.

"It passed in the negative.

"Ordered, That the resolution this day agreed to by the House of Representatives, relative to the notification of the election of the Vice President elect, be referred to Messrs. Mason, Hillhouse, and Sedgwick, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

"Mr. Mason reported from the committee last appointed, and the report being read, was amended and adopted as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be transmitted to Thomas Jefferson, Esq., of Virginia, Vice President elect of the United States, notification of his election to that office, and that the President of the Senate do make out and sign a certificate in the words following:

"Be it known, that the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, being convened in the City of Philadelphia, on the second Wednesday of February, in the year of our Lord 1797, the undersigned Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and for a Vice President, by which it appears that Thomas Jefferson, Esq., was duly elected, agreeably to the Constitution, Vice President of the United States of America.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this 10th day of February, 1797.

"JOHN ADAMS.

"Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States."

And precisely similar certificates by the President of the Senate, declaring in every case that he, the President of the Senate, had opened and counted all the votes, were issued in 1789, 1793, 1797, 1801, 1805, 1809, 1813, and 1817; and it was only in 1821, when the House of Representatives claimed to discuss the electoral vote of Missouri, that the Senate ceased to exercise its right to issue a certificate, setting forth that its President had exercised his constitutional duty to open the certificates and count the votes of the electoral colleges and declare the result.

In 1801 occurred the difficulty between Jefferson and Burr under the Constitution as it was originally framed—each claiming the Presidency. Consequently, the two houses of Congress passed, and in 1804 the several States adopted, the twelfth amendment of the Constitution, which is now in force, and under which the recent Presidential election took place. And on reference to that amendment it will be perceived that, so far as the opening the certificates and counting the electoral votes are concerned, both Congress and the people, through their State Legislatures, adhered to the identical language of the Constitution of 1787. That is to say, the amendment, as well as the article amended, directs that "the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted."

And why was this? Because the convention which framed the Constitution, on the 17th of September, 1787, after that instrument had been engrossed and was in the hands of their President, George Washington, to be laid before the Congress of the Confederacy, passed a resolution, construing article 11, section 23, of the Constitution, and directing the President of the Senate to count the votes, as well as open the certificates, of the electoral colleges, and declare who was elected President. And also, because the full meaning of article 11 had been declared by the practice of the Senate, its President, and the House of Representatives, in the election of George Washington, in 1789 and 1793, of John Adams in 1797, and of Thomas Jefferson in 1801.

THE FRAMERS OF THE CONSTITUTION ITS BEST EXPOUNDERS.

No intelligent person who claims to be honest will pretend to deny that those who framed the Constitution were the best expounders of its meaning, and the convention which framed that instrument, on the very day of its adjournment, Sept. 17, 1787, gave their explanation of the meaning of article 11 in their recommendation to the first Congress to assemble under it, how to proceed. Congress obeyed that recommendation in 1789, 1793 and 1797, and when, in 1801, the House of Representatives presumed to interfere with the action of the Senate, it promptly rebuked that body, and ordered the President of the Senate to certify to Mr. Jefferson that he, the President of the Senate, had, "in presence of both Houses of Congress, opened all the certificates, and counted all the votes of the electors for President and Vice President," and that Thomas Jefferson, Esq., was duly elected Vice President of the United States; and the House of Representatives submitted to the rebuke, and promptly repealed its resolution depriving the President of the Senate of his constitutional right and conferring it upon the President of the United States!

And from that time until 1821 the Senate never failed to order its President to issue to any Vice President elect a certificate, similar in all respects to that issued by John Adams to Thomas Jefferson.

I have thus, Mr. Editor, demonstrated to you and your readers that, by the Constitution, it is made the duty of the President of the Senate to open the certificates and count the votes of the electoral colleges. I have shown you that the convention which framed the Constitution so construed that instrument, and that they ordered the first Congress so to construe it. I have demonstrated to you, from Congressional records, that they and their successors did so construe it; and I have shown beyond cavil that such construction was in accordance with public opinion and the opinion of the framers of the Constitution, who, as members of Congress, were called upon to construe its provisions when it first went into operation. And I cannot better conclude than by quoting the following extract from the leading Democratic journal of this city, when claiming, and doubtless believing, because it had been so told that all precedents are in favor of the Democratic assumptions:

"The existing forms [the twenty-second joint rule] originated and have expanded under notions of propriety and courtesy. They are of no obligation whatever and have no force. Abused as many of them have been in the sense of centralizing power around the President, and investing him with attributes never contemplated by the Constitution, it might be well now to return to the plain modes of the fathers."

You will perceive that I have made no allusions to the Oregon trick to give Mr.

Tilden an electoral vote. I have not done so, simply because it is quite unworthy of reference, except to denounce it as a disgrace to all concerned, and because I do not believe there is an honest Democrat in Congress who, if elected President of the Senate, would deem it possible to open and count the Grover-Cronin Oregon fraudulent certificate of the action of the electoral college of the State of Oregon.

JAMES WATSON WEBB.

KENT ON THE ELECTORAL VOTE.—Fernando Wood may be an expounder of the Constitution but he has not been recognized as authority in any respectable courts as yet. On a disputed point Chancellor Kent ought to be entitled to more weight than the man who, in 1861, advised the city of New York to secede from the State and the Union and set up a little empire of its own.

Kent, in his learned treatise commenting on the power of the Vice President to open and count the electoral vote, says:

"The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In the case of questionable votes and a closely-contested election this power may be all-important, and I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result, and that the two houses are present only as spectators, to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice is made by the electors."

If the Vice President was a Democrat instead of a Republican, this opinion would be, among Democrats, as strong and binding as if it was a clause of the Constitution itself.

SNEERING AT LABOR.—One of the kid-gloved fire-eaters of the South in a revolutionary speech delivered at the 8th of January pow-wow in Washington, tried to belittle Vice President Ferry by calling him a "lumberman from Michigan." It would be well for these high-toned gentlemen who despise honest labor to remember that the American people are as willing to have the constitutional functions of the Vice President exercised by a "lumberman from Michigan" as any one else. All the people ask is that the duties of the office be honestly and faithfully performed.

MEASURES AWAITING THE NEXT ADMINISTRATION.

The effort of President Grant to secure to the United States the island of St. Domingo, although unsuccessful, will yet be recognized as an act of statesmanship second to none in his wise and patriotic administration. Already regrets are being expressed at the loss of that golden opportunity for our country's aggrandizement. That able, independent paper, the Graphic, comments on the President's last message in the following statesmanlike style:

"The references in the President's message to the St. Domingo matter deserve the candid consideration of the American people. The policy which has obtained since the foundation of the Republic of focalizing all our political interests upon domestic concerns has, in the opinions of enlightened publicists, tended to belittle our national contests. Nations require a foreign policy, an interest in and sometimes alliances with the outside world. The habit of discussing and influencing other nations is profitable to all governments powerful enough to command respect. William H. Seward was the first of our statesmen who took measures to give this country its proper status among the Powers of the earth. His purchase of Alaska, his skillful negotiation for the island of St. Thomas, his desire to establish a protectorate over the Sandwich Islands, and to obtain naval stations in the Mediterranean and the Chinese seas, showed that he thought the time at hand for the United States to have colonies, a navy, and a foreign policy. The embarrassments we suffered during the civil war merely because England possessed important islands on our coast ought to have taught us the necessity of naval stations for shelter, and to furnish facilities for offense and defense. Yet President Grant stands almost alone among present statesmen in inheriting the broader international statesmanship of which the late Mr. Seward was a champion, and his earnest endeavor to secure the island of St. Domingo, which met with such strenuous opposition from conspicuous Republicans, was a wise and far-sighted act, and it will reflect increased honor upon his name as the years go by. It must be confessed that the Senators who opposed and defeated the accession of the island reflected the stay-at-home temper of the American people; but the President was clearly right and the American people just as clearly wrong. Some time, perhaps, during the coming decade, they will see and acknowledge the creditable foresight of the President and Mr. Seward. We can never have a large politics in this country till we have larger themes to occupy public attention. Our political contests are narrow and mean because they concern ourselves alone. The nation, like the individual, shrivels if it destroys all foreign sympathies and endeavors to live wholly within itself."

The acquisition of territory by the United States, since the formation of the Constitution, has been in every instance highly advantageous to the country and reflected honor on the statesmen who secured it.

The first and most notable instance was the purchase of Louisiana in 1803. There is no brighter page in the history of Jefferson's administration than that which records this great event. In the Capitol stands the statue of Robert R. Livingston, holding in his hand a scroll inscribed "Louisiana." It was the skillful diplomacy of Livingston that gave effect to this transcendent measure and secured to him immortal renown. If the newspapers of that day are examined, there will be found a similar style of opposition to President Jefferson's course in this matter to that we have seen manifested toward Grant's endeavors to acquire St. Domingo. Probably, Jefferson had also to contend with jealousies in his Cabinet and in the Senate, in carrying out the project, no less than Grant.

Credit is due, however, in the matter, more to Livingston than to Jefferson. The former was an accomplished diplomatist. He managed to bring the subject directly to Bonaparte's personal notice without the intervention of a minister. Livingston was asked to make an offer for the whole of Louisiana, which then embraced nearly all the territory now included in the United States west of the Mississippi and east of the Rocky Mountains. Livingston at first offered ten millions of dollars; Bonaparte suggested twenty millions; the final agreement was fifteen millions of dollars, including the payment, by our Government, of certain claims against France held by citizens of the United States. Jefferson could not very heartily approve of this negotiation on account of his strict construction of the Constitution. He nevertheless overcame his scruples, and gave his official sanction to the measure. This was our first step toward becoming a nation.

The acquisition of Florida in 1819 was the fruit of the splendid diplomacy of John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State under Monroe. The present State of Florida was but a small part of the territory, and the advantages acquired by the United States under Mr. Adams' treaty. The acquisition extended to the Red river, to the Arkansas river, and from its head along the 42d line of north latitude to the Pacific ocean, in settlement of disputed boundaries. Although we had acquired Louisiana from France, Spain still held the Floridas, and Cuba—the Keys of the Mississippi—until John Quincy Adams, in his war upon the "Colonial System," wrested Florida from foreign dominion, thus securing the moral and commercial independence of the United States.

Oregon we acquired by discovery and occupation; Texas by voluntary annexation; while California, New Mexico and Utah came to us as the results of war. Our latest acquisition, Alaska, is scarcely less important than some of the previous ones. It was needed to give us control of the Pacific coast and to enable us to negotiate a favorable treaty with China. The cost is being rapidly returned to our treasury from the revenue derived from furs alone. China expects some day to receive large quantities of lumber from Alaska.* We have only to look on the map and to suppose that England had acquired Alaska to realize its vital importance to the United States. Her British Majesty has now but a few miles of coast on the Pacific, she would then have had thousands. British Columbia and Lower California are still needed to complete our possessions on the Pacific Ocean. Then we shall be separated from the Old World on the West, as on the East, only by an ocean!

During the Revolutionary war the ports and harbors of the West India Islands were used by our enemy greatly to our damage, and in the war of 1812 we suffered no less from the same cause. Everybody knows how these ports and harbors were more recently occupied by the Confederates and their friends to thwart our efforts to subdue the rebellion. It was because the Federal Government had no foothold in those islands that the rebels and their allies were able to so seriously devastate and injure our commerce.

There was during the late war a universal feeling in the Government and among the people that we needed, beyond estimate, a naval out-post between the Atlantic coast and Europe. To obtain now, in time of peace, such an out-post peacefully and lawfully is the imperative duty of statesmen. So obvious and pressing is this duty to guard our coast against any transatlantic or other enemy that we forbear to urge the commercial considerations that press upon us. There are also political reasons of great weight why we should no longer hinder and delay our manifest destiny in this direction.

Among the last and most important acts of President Grant was to submit to Congress a report of the survey for a canal across the Isthmus. This project of connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans has long claimed the attention of statesmen. The need and value of such a work are more apparent than the advantages derived from the famous Suez canal, recently completed. The latter is no more important to Great Britain and the Indies than is the former to the United States and the trade of the Pacific coast, Japan, and China. In regard to the political effects of the enterprise it was long since predicted that whatever naval power obtained control of the Darien or Panama canal would derive a vast increase of political strength from the possession. Secretary Seward in his efforts to secure by treaty this great political advantage saw also its transcendent importance to our commerce. He went to New York specially to engage its capitalists and merchants in the work. He met there, at the house of Peter Cooper, such men as Roberts, Duncan, Schell, Garrison, and others, to whom he unfolded the scheme in its relations to trade and commerce.

President Grant has not allowed the enterprise to die out, but with that sagacious statesmanship which has marked his administration, he has caused the surveys of the route to be completed. The result has been reported to Congress and is highly encouraging as to the feasibility of the project. It is not necessary to dwell on the commercial advantages of this great work. By it the products of Japan and China may be brought to our Atlantic cities in about the same time as now required, via the Pacific railroad, and at half the cost. Great Britain, with wonderful sagacity, obtained control of the Suez canal, and shall the United States allow a greater prize to be lost? The possession of islands in the Carribean sea and in the Pacific ocean by our Government would make the control of the Isthmus canal a matter of political and commercial necessity. It would be a discredit to our national reputation for sagacity if we should allow minor questions and disputes to hinder and delay any of these great national enterprises.

SENATORIAL SUGGESTIONS.

It has been published far and wide that a distinguished Republican statesman has been expressing the opinion that it will be for the best interest of the Republican party to have Tilden inaugurated, because during the four years of his administration the people will become so disgusted with democracy that they will have no more of it forever. We do not credit any Republican Senator with holding such nonsense, much less with having given utterance to it. Mrs. O'Flaherty, who wanted her boys to catch the itch when young, so that during the rest of their lives they might be induced to be careful of the infection, was a much better philosopher than the statesman in question, if such a one there be. The old idea of letting the devil in for the purpose of kicking him out instead of keeping him out altogether, has not yet been accepted as evidence of very great wisdom on the part of the select body of individuals who hold it, by the rest of mankind; and if we have a Senator who really has manifested wisdom in this form, his constituents will no doubt be very thankful that his name has been carefully suppressed.

The Washington correspondent of the Tribune informs the public that he has talked with a Democratic Senator, and "singularly enough" the Democrat holds precisely the same opinion concerning the effect of the inauguration of Hayes upon the Democratic party—that it would be beneficial. So both parties regard the triumph of their opponents as a very desirable thing to be achieved. The correspondent does not say that the Republican Senator voted for Tilden, or the Democratic Senator for Hayes—probably their great illumination did not dawn upon their illustrious minds until after election day had gone by, and hence they were saved the mortification of advocating before the people the preposterous proposition that a cause is more likely to prosper in the hands of its enemies than in the hands of its friends.

It is not to be disguised that in the course of history the injudicious conduct of Satan has at times seemed to advance the cause of righteousness. That is one thing; but it is quite another thing to work and pray for a period of Satanic rule in order to hurry up the millennium. There have been instances in history where infants have been suckled to advantage by wolves, but it is not yet fully established that it is the safest way for the perpetuation of the human race to intrust the care of the rising generation to that mode of physical culture and sustenance.

The case of the Democratic Senator differs from the Republican in a very important respect, which must be noticed before proceeding further. He sees that the advent of Tilden would bring down upon the administration a horde of office-seekers of unparalleled greediness, composed largely of the dangerous classes of society, who have fought in the late campaign solely for booty, and whose claims cannot be denied or resisted. If they are not given the offices they have been promised, they will go back on the party, for most of them are not in a condition to wait longer, and it is a case of "now or never," and denial is death to the party. The applicants will be millions; the places hundreds, so that denials must come, and disappointment must be the rule. On the other hand, those who will get places will be largely unfit, as was the case when the offices of the House were filled by the hungry crew which came swooping in on the opening of the present Congress and alighted on the fat lands and rich gardens of the southerly wing of the National Capitol, so much to the national disgust and mortification.

That a Democratic Congressman fully realizes the danger of his party in this direction is not to be expected, but no one who saw the make-up of the body of aspirants who infested Washington last year and who had to submit to the levy of personal contribution to a fund for the purpose of ridding the city of the presence of no inconsiderable a portion of these excessively hopeful patriots, will ever after fail to include them as an element in the chances of successful administration of a highly dangerous character and fearful proportions.

In view, moreover, of the capacity conspicuously lacking in the present House to manage affairs and meet the public expectation, a Democratic Senator might well say that the election of Hayes would avert most of the damage which the party would have to shoulder if Tilden comes in and endeavors to carry on the Government with assistants and coadjutors so wanting in common sense and so addicted to the error of confounding makeshifts with statesmanship. And beyond all this the Democratic Senator must be aware that generally speaking the present Democratic House is composed largely of its best brain and moral composition. Its most experienced and ablest men are in the van. Cox, Wood, Randall, Knott, Hurd, Tucker, and Reagan, to say nothing of Springer, Harrison, and Tarbox, are the élite of the Democratic aristocracy, and if there should be a falling back from them, the very next strata in the geological formation is composed of that other set of whom John Morrissey is a leader and representative, and Cronin and Grover are disciples and dupes.

Against this contemplated catastrophe, of falling back on the reserves, the Senator feels there is no protection whatever, save the supposed common sense and power of management of Tilden himself; and since the tracing of that $8,000 check from far-off Oregon to the rooms of the Liberty Street Bureau, the sagacity of Uncle Sammy has in public estimation descended to very near the level of his moral honesty; which appears to be on the same plane as that of the slippery thimble-riggers of the northern coast of the Pacific.

It will thus be readily seen that the Democrat is not without just reasons for thinking that the welfare and good name of his party are dependent upon its being kept at a safe distance from the responsibilities of power and the temptations of place. So long as its wisdom is merely hypothetical, and the fools are not all dead, it will not be utterly without reputation or numbers. As a home for the uneasy, and a refuge for the disgruntled and disappointed politician, and as the prospective haven for the hermaphrodite class who glory in the exceedingly ambiguous title of Independent, the Democratic party out of power has an important use, and the desire to have it kept where it now is should be commended and encouraged by all true patriots and citizens.

The Republican Senator is governed in opinion by considerations of precisely the opposite nature. He clings to an old delusion that "the devil given a certain quantity of rope will hang himself," and benevolently proposes to dispose of the Democratic party by this ancient method, forgetting that the theory always breaks down at the point where the supply of rope gives out; and it always gives out. The theory presupposes that the nature of the Democratic party is not known, and that to comprehend and appreciate it, four years of Tilden are necessary. The assumption is gratuitous. It is not necessary—we beg the Senator's pardon—to go clean to the bottom of a cesspool to ascertain that its contents are foul. Haven't we had four years of Pierce, four of Buchanan, rebellion, war, assassination, Kuklux, and all sorts of damnable things as the result of Democratic rule? The spoils system, which is so alarming to the civil-service reformers, to Trumbull and the New York Nation, and the Adamses and Samuel Bowles, was a pure Democratic invention. Repudiation has never been advocated outside of the Democratic ranks. Nobody but Democrats is in favor of paying rebel war claims. The Democratic party alone is opposed to registration and proper safeguards against fraud in elections. The shot-gun policy is of pure Democratic origin, so is intimidation, so is the Oregon method of stealing votes; and must we have Tilden on top of all these things to prove Democracy an undesirable thing?

It is to be hoped that no Republican Senator has got bewildered by any nonsense of this kind. If a Democrat can see in the election and administration of Hayes that his party will be saved from the commission of tremendous malpractices, and restrained from making deadly assaults upon the Constitution and liberty, and the cause of order and good government, it is difficult to think that a Republican can be blind to the possible glories which the administration of Hayes will inaugurate, and the material benefits it must secure to the people at large. The advent of the Republican party to power was the dawn of a new era, and was so recognized by the friends of slavery, and the advocates of disunion. From both these evils it saved the country, and endeavored to establish on a permanent basis, union, freedom, and equal rights. A little of Tilden is not essential by way of contrast. Memories of Buchanan and recollections of Jeff Davis are still too fresh to require any other illustrations of the spirit of evil. The country is surfeited already with that kind of aliment. The Constitution is strong, but it may not bear everything. The proposition of experimenting four years with rehabilitated Democracy is staggering in the extreme, and we hope the Republican Senator will not further distinguish himself by urging his peculiar opinion upon the attention of his fellow-men. The Democrat may continue.

GOOD EVIDENCE.—John Adams is supposed to have known something about the Constitution. He was Vice President and presiding officer to count the vote, and he signed a certificate in 1797, acting then as Vice President and as President of the Senate, that he had opened the certificates and counted the votes.

Thomas Jefferson, the father of the democracy as it is claimed—and it is astonishing that those who claim to be his children should deny and go back upon his early teachings in regard to the rights of the States—in 1801 signed a certificate in which he stated—

“That * * * on the second Wednesday of February, A. D. 1801, the underwritten, Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for President. * * *

“In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 18th day of February, 1801. “THOMAS JEFFERSON.”

DEMOCRATIC ASSUMPTION.—The world moves! But yesterday it was Cæsarism to protect a State Legislature from the attacks of an armed mob; to-day, democracy claims the right to arrest the officials of a State, because they refuse to surrender to a House Committee the official records of the State. If the returning board of Louisiana can be arrested, its Legislature can. Shades of Calhoun! and this assumption comes from a party that has opposed centralization, and denied the right of the Federal Government to extend the arm of protection over its persecuted citizens in the South. Let us hear no more about the unconstitutional enforcement acts of the Radical party.

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

WHO SHALL DECLARE THE RESULT OF THE ELECTORAL VOTE?

A CLEAR EXPOSITION BY MR. E. W. STOUGHTON OF CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLES AND PRECEDENTS—DEMOCRATIC ABSURDITIES EXAMINED AND EXPOSED—A QUESTION WHICH CAN BE SETTLED NEITHER BY BARGAIN NOR COMPROMISE.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 6.]

The people of the several States have, in pursuance of the Constitution, cast their votes for electors, who have discharged their duty by casting and certifying their votes for President and Vice President of the United States. Those two great officers are now actually elected. To ascertain who they are, the electoral votes of the several States must be counted and the result declared; and for the first time in our history the nation is agitated by the inquiry, upon whom does this duty devolve?

Is it to be performed by the President of the Senate, or by such persons or officials as that body and the House of Representatives shall agree upon; and if they cannot agree, are the votes to be counted at all, and if yea, by whom; and if not counted because of a failure to agree, is the House to elect the President, or is a new election to be ordered—to be attended, perhaps, by the same result; and if the two Houses do agree upon a mode of counting, may either at pleasure constitutionally object to counting the electoral votes of a State, and thus exclude them? for if this may be lawfully done, an election of President and Vice President can always be prevented, and the election of President be finally usurped by the House, or a new election made necessary with possibly the same result as before. These are grave questions, thrust upon us at this crisis, and Democratic leaders have threatened, as I am told, that if the President of the Senate shall proceed to count the electoral votes, the House will withdraw from the scene, elect Mr. Tilden President, and, by armed bands, now it is said being organized, will maintain his right to that great office by force. I attach but little consequence to these threats. They are made at the North by the same men who boasted in 1861 that they would prevent radical Republicans from marching South to subdue the rebellion; and these persons will hereafter, as then, cease to bluster when confronted by actual danger. Their Southern allies will hardly trust again to treasonable promises, and we may therefore reasonably expect that these threatenings will continue only so long as there is hope that the Republican party will abandon its constitutional right to inaugurate Governor Hayes—already legally elected as President of the United States.

But while intelligent men of but moderate courage will not be intimidated by threats of another rebellion, justice, policy, and common sense alike demand that the questions raised be solved in the light of law and the Constitution, and for this purpose I venture to make some suggestions.

THE DUTY OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

It was said by Chancellor Kent, a great authority, that although the Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted, he presumed "in the absence of all legislative provisions on the subject, the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result, and that the two Houses are present merely as spectators to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction." There was not when he thus wrote—there is not now—there never has been, as I believe, any legislative provisions whatever on the subject of counting the electoral vote. His opinion was based upon that provision of the Constitution which declares that electors appointed by the several States "shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President and Vice President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify and transmit, sealed, to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted;" and in reaching this conclusion the Chancellor was guided not only by rules of construction, by him profoundly studied, applicable to the interpretation of all written instruments, but by a practice originating with the framers of our Constitution. I shall briefly inquire what construction may fairly be put upon the provision in question; what would be the result of that now insisted upon by many able and learned men who decline to adopt that suggested by Chancellor Kent, and what has been the practice hitherto in counting the electoral votes for President and Vice President, from all of which the common sense of the nation will, as I think, recognize the wisdom of his opinion.

THE DEMOCRATIC VIEW.

It is urged by those who dissent from this, and especially by Democratic leaders, that the President of the Senate is not by the Constitution empowered to open and count the electoral votes. They admit he may open the certificates containing them, but insist that there his functions cease. In other words, his power, it is said, begins and ends with breaking the seals of the packages—a duty which a clerk or office boy might as well perform; and when this is done it is said the certificates and votes must be handed over to the Senate and House for further action; and right here the embarrassment begins. Bear in mind that there is no legislation on this subject, and therefore there is no particular member of Senate or House to whom, under the Constitution and laws, the unsealed packages may be confided. If it be said the two Houses may agree upon a mode of counting the votes, and upon the person by whom they are to be counted, I answer they cannot be compelled so to do. Already this difficulty is impending, and it is hardly probable the House committee will consent to a plan which will not enable the House of Representatives arbitrarily to reject the vote of one or more States and thus insure the election of Mr. Tilden. If, therefore, no agreement is reached, what, upon this theory, is to be done with the electoral votes? They cannot, it is urged, be counted, and hence another election must be ordered; for if no count whatever takes place it will hardly be contended the House of Representatives may elect.

I will state some consequences which may practically follow this doctrine. It is based upon the theory that the Senate and House must, as a preliminary to any count whatever, agree upon the mode of so doing, and that either may at pleasure, and with or without cause, arbitrarily object to counting the vote of any particular State, in which event it is to be rejected. If that be so either body can at will defeat an election by the people. So, too, it is insisted that should the President of the Senate proceed to count the electoral vote, he can do so only in presence of both Houses, and that, should the House of Representatives retire—as has been threatened—the count cannot proceed, and thus the will of the people may be frustrated.

These are some of the revolutionary proceedings which have been suggested by Democratic leaders to defeat the inauguration of Mr. Hayes as President. They are hardly worthy of statesmen, and, if attempted, are not likely to prove successful.

This theory may be summed up as follows: If the two Houses cannot agree upon a mode of counting the electoral vote, it cannot be counted. If a mode is agreed upon, and the count proceeds, it is in the power of the House of Representatives or of the Senate, by objecting to the vote of any State, to cause its rejection; and if, in the absence of such agreement, the President of the Senate attempts to count the vote, the objection suggested may not only be interposed, but the House of Representatives may, by retiring, defeat the count altogether.

THE ABSURDITY OF IT.

Now, if these measures may be lawfully resorted to, it is because they are authorized by the Constitution, for, as there is no legislation on the subject, we must resort to that instrument to learn what may be legally done. Let us, as a test, incorporate into it the construction contended for, and thus learn whether its framers probably contemplated one so utterly impracticable. It is but fair to do this, for whatever language is necessarily employed to interpret an instrument becomes a part of it.

The Constitution thus interpreted would therefore read: "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted—if the two Houses can agree upon a mode of counting the same, but not otherwise; provided, however, that if either House shall object to counting the electoral vote of any State, it shall not be counted; and provided also, that if the President of the Senate shall, after opening the packages containing said votes, proceed to count the same, the House of Representatives may retire, and thus prevent him from so doing."

If I have in this paraphrase of the Constitution misrepresented the theory, when reduced to practice, of those who deny the right of the President of the Senate, in the absence of legislation, to count the electoral vote, they can easily correct me—as, perhaps, they may feel disposed to do, when they perceive to what consequences their doctrine inevitably leads. If they shall decline to accept as their own the construction I have stated, they should frankly and publicly avow what their doctrine actually is, that the people of the United States may know whether those who insist that Mr. Tilden is elected do or do not claim that the House of Representatives may at will, in one of the modes suggested, arbitrarily prevent the counting of the electoral vote.

THE TRUE INTENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

It has been for generations wisely and justly settled that when the meaning of words employed in any written constitution, law, or instrument is doubtful, the construction put upon the words by those whose duty it is and has been to interpret and act under the instrument, is entitled to great weight, and is frequently decisive; and especially is this so where a contrary interpretation would operate unjustly or cause great public or private inconvenience or injury. I have mentioned the grave national evils which might at the pleasure of either Senate or House of Representatives ensue from construing the Constitution as suggested, and before proceeding to invoke the construction practically put upon it by its framers, and as I understand it for a long time by both Houses, not inconsistent with the opinion of Chancellor Kent, I will present a few observations to test its soundness.

It is well for this purpose to state the estimate undoubtedly formed by those who framed the Constitution, of the character, wisdom, and attainments of the person who would probably thereafter be selected to fill the great office of Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate. It was by them regarded as an office of much dignity and honor—the incumbent of which might, and several times did, become President of the United States. Our fathers could not have supposed he would lack the integrity, capacity, and learning necessary for the faithful discharge of the responsible duties which might devolve upon him, and they certainly could not have regarded that of opening and counting electoral votes in the presence of and subject to the inspection of the Representatives of the nation, as of greater difficulty and importance than those which he might be called upon to perform as President of the Senate, and especially as the possible President of the United States.

He was to be in their esteem a great and highly honored magistrate, beyond suspicion of unfairness, whose every official act was to be performed in the presence of a free, intelligent, and independent people, upon whose judgment his fame would forever rest.

Consider now the nature of the duty involved in receiving, opening, and counting electoral votes; and whether the framers of the Constitution could have considered it one demanding capacity, integrity, or learning beyond that which they might fairly assume would be possessed by the second magistrate of the nation.

To him was confided the duty of receiving and safely keeping the electoral votes in their sealed packages until they were to be opened in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives and counted. It was eminently fitting that this solemn ceremony should be so performed that the whole nation might by its representatives be, in the language of Chancellor Kent, “spectators to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction.”

STATE ACTION CONCLUSIVE.

It should be borne in mind that each State was by the Constitution to appoint electors in such manner as the legislature thereof might direct, and hence the only duty which could devolve upon the Vice President would be that of determining—not whether a State was in such relation to the Union as to entitle it to participate in the election of President and Vice President—for that was and is a political question to be determined by Congress or the Executive, but whether the certificates to be opened contained electoral votes which should be counted. With the justice or propriety of the laws of the several States prescribing or regulating the mode of appointing electors, neither the Vice President nor Congress could interfere, for this was a subject over which each State had supreme and exclusive jurisdiction. Thus if the State of New York or Louisiana should provide that electors should be appointed by the sheriff of any particular county or parish instead of by the votes of the people, electors so appointed would be entitled to cast their votes for President or Vice President; and should the statute of New York authorize them to be elected by the people and create a returning board authorized in its discretion, and without appeal, to reject the votes of any ward, township, or county where fraud or violence by the successful party had prevented a fair election, the decision of such board upon the question would be conclusive; and its determination as to the number of votes lawfully cast and the persons appointed electors final. And should a committee of Congress be appointed in such case to inquire as to the alleged fraud or violence, or as to the proof upon which the board acted, a sensible and law-abiding citizen would naturally inquire of the committee the purpose to be accomplished by its investigation, and of the House what action it intended to take when its committee should report. And if some one or more of its number should suggest that it was thought the committee might learn that the weight of testimony before the board was against its conclusion, he would, if so ignorant as to suppose this to be a cause for disturbing its decision, be told—should he chance to encounter a person of some intelligence—that courts of justice and jurors frequently decide against the preponderance of proof, but that their judgments and verdicts must stand until set aside by competent tribunals; and the zealous member would doubtless be also told that Congress has no jurisdiction to set aside the decision of a State returning board because it might have obtained further proof, or because the evidence before it would have justified a different conclusion. Those who are familiar with the proof which was before the returning board of Louisiana, and those acquainted with that already taken there by the Committees of the Senate and House, are aware that the evidence before the board warranted its conclusion, and that the testimony since taken tends only to confirm its accuracy and justice. But if this were otherwise, as the board heard competent testimony on both sides, its decision within its jurisdiction must stand, although the House or its committee might think the weight of proof against it. I allude to the absolute power of the several States to appoint electors in any mode they see fit to adopt, and to the incapacity of Congress to meddle with the subject, only to show that the duty of the President of the Senate to open the certificates, ascertain their validity, and the votes to be counted, is mainly ministerial, and involves no serious judicial inquiry. It was not, it is fairly to be presumed, in the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution that certificates or votes would be forged, or that the ascertainment of those to be counted would be difficult. It was of course known that the Vice President would belong to one of the political parties, but it was not supposed this would disqualify him to act fairly and as should become his high and responsible position. If it be said that the present emergency was not anticipated by those who framed and adopted the Constitution, I answer that while the duty which might devolve upon the President of the Senate, of deciding between the honest vote of Oregon and the disgraceful and fraudulent vote manufactured by Cronin and Governor Grover—between the vote of Louisiana as finally determined by the returning board and that manufactured and forwarded to Washington by persons having no color of authority, and between the two sets of certificates which may perhaps be sent to him from Florida, is by no means difficult, and involves but little investigation. It is not the difficulty of the duty to be performed in an unforeseen emergency which will authorize a departure from or violation of a constitutional provision.

AMPLE POWERS EXISTING.

If the emergency was not anticipated by its authors—if they supposed the duty of counting the electoral votes would be substantially ministerial, involving little or no inquiry as to the validity and identity of certificates to be opened and votes to be counted—and if, under this impression, they nevertheless devolved that in question upon the President of the Senate, he is thereafter bound to perform it, no matter how difficult and responsible unforeseen circumstances may render it; and when these arise, all citizens are bound to submit to the exercise of his constitutional authority, and to accept as valid and binding the conclusion he may reach as to which are the true electoral votes of the States from whence the certificates are forwarded.

The Constitution declares he shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. What certificate is he to open? and what votes are to be counted? Clearly those, and only those, transmitted by electors lawfully appointed. Who is to determine this? The President of the Senate can, if bound to perform this duty, receive proof on the subject, if necessary to determine which certificate is genuine, and is quite competent to consider and pass upon the question, and, in the absence of legislation, seems to be the only officer or tribunal capable of so doing.

The two Houses are to be present, but they do not act jointly. They must act, if at all, separately. Which of these two bodies, if they differ, is to determine the genuineness of the certificates and of the votes, if the President of the Senate cannot constitutionally do so? Neither is the superior of the other, nor can either assume the power as against the other of counting the votes. Each, upon the theory of Mr. Tilden's followers, claims the right, not to count the votes, but practically to prevent their being counted. Either House may, it is urged, decline to agree upon a mode of counting them, and under any and all circumstances, each, it is said, has the right to insist upon the rejection of the vote of any State at will. The dog in the manger occupied precisely this position, with some little advantage of argument in favor of the dog.

Fairly stated, the conclusion to be derived from this reasoning is that upon no officer or tribunal is constitutionally devolved the power or duty to count the electoral vote for President and Vice President of the United States. The President of the Senate cannot do it; the Senate cannot do it; the House cannot. Who can? The followers of Tilden answer, we will consent to a scheme for so doing, but only upon condition that we may at pleasure count him in or so confuse and confound the electoral vote as to enable the House of Representatives to elect him.

LET US HAVE NO BARGAINS.

In the name of the authors of the Constitution, whose intelligence is thus questioned and insulted—in the interest of justice and of common sense, and of all good citizens, I denounce this doctrine as mischievous, unconstitutional, and revolutionary. Bargains based upon such pretensions, to accomplish such a purpose, statesmen, Senators, Representatives, will, I trust, decline to make. Already the Constitution has been, as I believe, disregarded, and great national interests imperiled, by the adoption of the twenty-second joint rule—a mischievous precedent established in 1865—not merely to secure a count of the electoral votes by the action of the two Houses, or by the several action of either, but to enable either House to insist upon the rejection of the vote of certain rebellious States, upon the ground that they had not resumed such relations in the Union as entitled them to cast electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States. This was not legislation, and was a rule unwisely adopted. Let those who insist that no constitutional mode has been provided by which to count the votes of States confessedly within the Union, and that none will be agreed to except upon condition of consenting to a plan for the election of Mr. Tilden, be told that the grave reproach suggested does not rest upon the Constitution or its authors, and that treasonable bargains cannot be forced by threats, or achieved by unlawful contrivances, but that in the absence of legislation on the subject, or of any fair arrangement which does not give the election of President to the House, “the President of the Senate (in the language of Chancellor Kent before cited) counts the votes and determines the result, and that the two Houses are present only as spectators to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction.”

THE PRECEDENTS.

Let us now briefly inquire upon what precedents that illustrious Judge based his conclusion—independent of the construction which may be fairly given to the Constitution itself.

When that instrument was submitted to the States for adoption by the convention which framed it, one of the resolutions adopted by that convention, and which accompanied the Constitution as proposed, was that as soon as the conventions of nine States should have ratified the Constitution, Congress should fix a day for the appointment of electors, and a day on which they should assemble to vote for President; and that upon so voting, they should transmit their votes, sealed, &c., to the Secretary of the United States, (there being then no President of the Senate,) and that the Senate and House of Representatives should convene, and that “the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the vote for President.”

On the 6th of April, 1789, “the Senate proceeded to ballot for the choice of a President for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States,” and John Langdon was elected.

Now this was the work of the authors of the Constitution. The convention which framed it recommended that a President of the Senate should be appointed “for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the electoral votes,” and he was so chosen. That was to be, and was, his only function. Now, if it had been intended by the framers of that enactment that the President of the Senate was not to count the votes, but that such duty was to devolve upon the Senate and House if they could agree—and upon no mortal or tribunal if they could not—doubtless the idle ceremony of appointing a President of the Senate solely for such a purpose would have been dispensed with. Probably one would not have been appointed merely to break the seals of the certificates, as that could as well have been done by a clerk or porter.

Mr. Langdon, after the two Houses met, declared that “he in their presence had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice President of the United States,” and that George Washington was unanimously elected President, and that John Adams was duly elected Vice President. Thereupon, a committee of four was appointed to prepare a certificate of the election, to be signed by Mr. Langdon, and that framed and by him signed stated that he “did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors,” &c.

Such was the practical construction put by the framers of the Constitution upon the clause under consideration, and it would seem to be decisive as to its true meaning.

In substantial harmony with this practical construction, the votes continued thereafter were counted upon many occasions, the particulars of which it is hardly necessary to state. The Senate and House were in the habit of appointing tellers "to make lists of the votes for President and Vice President of the United States as they shall be declared." Such was the form adopted in the appointment of these persons up to and in 1829, in 1833, in 1841, in 1849, and 1853. Their duty was to make these lists substantially in aid of the President of the Senate; for it was never, down to the period last named, supposed or pretended that they had any power whatever to count the votes. They were by the terms of their appointment to make a list of the votes "as they shall be declared," and they were to be declared—not by the tellers, but by the President of the Senate.

It was, of course, desirable that each House should preserve among its archives one of these lists, as a record of what it had witnessed. From time to time, objections to the counting of the electoral votes were made by members of the Senate or House of Representatives, but in three of the most notable instances the objections were to counting votes of States upon the ground that they had not been admitted to the Union at the time their electoral vote was cast. In no instance, it is believed, was the general right of the President of the Senate to count the electoral vote actually questioned in practice, although in several instances the question was raised whether some particular vote should or should not be counted, and in debate, both Senators and Representatives have, of late years, asserted the right of the two Houses to count. Whether this is to overthrow the authority of the early practice to which I have referred should be carefully considered, as well as the peril and inconvenience of the absence of any lawful means of counting the electoral vote.

When objections have been made by members of either House to counting any particular vote, they have never conferred together or listened to debate upon the subject; and upon no occasion, that I am aware of, was it insisted or suggested that the two Houses could act jointly in convention for the purpose of counting the votes, or considering any question which might arise.

In 1857, when Mr. Buchanan was elected, tellers were appointed as before, "to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared," and for the first time, as I believe, in their history, they reported "that they have counted the votes of all the States cast for President and Vice President," &c., and Mr. Buchanan was declared elected.

It was an ill omen that for the first time in the history of the Government the tellers should have reported that they had counted the electoral votes.

During the term of the President thus counted in, the rebellion was by him and his party nourished until it finally ripened and culminated. Upon the counting of the votes in 1861, the President of the Senate declared Mr. Lincoln elected President—tellers having been as usual appointed by the two Houses "to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared," and they were declared, as before stated, by the President of the Senate.

The twenty-second joint rule of the two Houses, already mentioned, was made in February, 1865, by which they agreed that no electoral vote objected to by either should be counted, except by the concurrent votes of the two. The real purpose of the rule was, as I have before stated, to prevent States whose relations with the Union were not constitutionally established from voting for President and Vice President. It was made when both Houses were in pursuit of the same object; and, although the same end might doubtless have been obtained by other means, the rule was agreed to evidently without much consideration, and very clearly not in harmony with the Constitution or with antecedent practice under it.

CONCLUSIONS.

If the committees now appointed for conference should agree that, unless a majority of both Houses concur in rejecting an electoral vote, it must be counted, a conclusion as it seems to me much more just would be reached than that which the rule established, and I may, I think, add, that such a mode of settling the difficulty would be satisfactory to the country, although others may be equally so.

I cannot doubt, however, that wise legislation on this subject is indispensably necessary to settle a question on which such a difference of opinion exists. It is probably too late now to frame and adopt it with a view to the count of the vote in February. In the absence of such legislation, it seems to me the early practice adopted by the framers of the Constitution, and stated by Chancellor Kent as the true one, should now be repeated. Any compromise which seeks a solution of the difficulty outside of and independent of the provisions of the Constitution, is quite likely to prove in the end a curse instead of a blessing; and none is very likely to be agreed upon so well calculated to compose the minds as that adopted by our Revolutionary fathers. If men should be so mad or foolish as to resist by violence the inauguration or rule of an honest, able, and patriotic man, because the votes which elected him were counted in the same manner as were those which elected George Washington and many succeeding Presidents, let the consequences be upon their heads. A corporal's guard will not be found willing to engage in an enterprise so wicked after the 4th of March next.

I had written thus far before reading a pamphlet entitled "The Electoral Votes of 1876," in which Mr. David Dudley Field attempts to state who should count the votes, what should be counted, and the remedy for a wrong count. Upon reading the pamphlet, I find he might consistently with any practical purpose have entirely omitted to consider the last two questions, for he assumes the two Houses alone have the power to count the electoral vote, and states: "The result must be that what the two Houses do not agree to count cannot be counted." This conclusion appears from the tone of his pamphlet to be quite satisfactory to him. To me it is otherwise, for it is discouraging to learn that after the people have, through their electors, cast their votes for President and Vice President, there should be found no tribunal having the power, and whose duty it is, to determine the persons actually elected; and this is especially so when I reflect that at the close of another election, should one be held, Mr. Field may again declare, "The result must be that what the two Houses do not agree to count cannot be counted."

Possibly he might weary of this repetition; perhaps a change of circumstances might lead him to reconsider and even change his conclusion; but supposing him to stand firm, there would be no mode of relief unless a majority of the people or the President of the Senate should differ with him. He goes on a brief mission to Congress, where, as his pamphlet indicates, he will be enrolled among the followers of Mr. Tilden. If he should assist in defeating the will of the people as already expressed, and in compelling a resort to another election, a national misfortune, to which the World refers with apparent favor, the injury, nay, destruction, which such success will entail upon the business and social interests of the country, may lead Mr. Field and those with whom he acts to the conclusion that such a mode of counting the electoral vote as was recommended and adopted by the framers of our Constitution is more wise, more just, and better calculated to insure the happiness and prosperity of our people than a method founded upon the proposition that "the result must be that what the two Houses do not agree to count cannot be counted."

E. W. STOUGHTON.

MR. TILDEN'S DEFEAT.

There is an element of unutterable meanness mixed up in the Democratic clamor over Mr. Tilden's defeat for the Presidency. No man knew Mr. Tilden better than John Kelly, and no man labored with greater vehemence to prevent his nomination, on the simple yet specific ground of his thorough unfitness for the office, and the impossibility of concealing from the public a knowledge of his character. While Mr. Kelly took no pains to hide the motive of his opposition to Mr. Tilden, and went about expressing his regret at the certainty of Mr. Tilden's defeat, and through him of the defeat of the party he represented, it is curious to know that the Democrats in the House of Representatives—both the Southern rebels and their sympathizers—were laboring to expose him by means of the investigating committees, and happily succeeded in doing so. These investigating committees which the Democrats designed to break down the Republican party and turn back the progress of the Republic, provided the people with a double-edged weapon. Every report exhibited the animus of the Democrats on the committee making it, and furnished facts, which even Democrats were forced to admit, as food for public thought. The Democracy take no note of the intelligence of the audience they address. They forget the people are as much interested in the information published as themselves, if not more so. Certainly the people love the truth, and are better able to arrive at the truth than the wretched Democratic partisans on committees. The time has passed to lead the people astray by a public document. They prefer to judge for themselves from the evidence before them, and in many instances they have turned away from the lying Democratic reports to see what the witnesses said and to determine what credit should be given them. This spirit of investigation and judgment is the fruit of the centennial year, and the Democrats having been caught in their own trap, are submitted by Republicans, as any other specimens of creation, to the political microscope for the purpose of ascertaining what they are and what their chief characteristics.

Mr. Tilden's defeat at the polls was the defeat of the Democratic party as its standard bearer, and the wide-spread fear of Democrats all over the country arose from a dark presentment that they would be beaten. The Democratic party was before the country. It had been suddenly called upon to give an account of itself, for the reason that one of the weakest and worst of its copperhead leaders had been thrust into undue prominence. Mr. Tilden was ambitious. Without the weight or character necessary to sustain the office of President of the United States, if elected, he wanted the office. He said he wanted the office—almost as a child cries for a new toy. He was, indeed, so foolish as to bow to the whirlwind, blowing to the four winds of heaven the facts of his life as a Democratic politician, and to lift up his voice and declare that the people wanted him—for he was a reformer! He had reached political dotage or second childhood.

Mr. Tilden's friends were in agony at the contretemps. Only such as Mr. Hewitt, Mr. S. S. Cox, and others of the same kindey, thought the silliness grand. Respectable Democrats looked on with horror, because they knew that the investigations which had to be made would put Mr. Tilden in a position which would cut him off forever from any chance of regaining the pedestal from which he would be thrown. The knowledge of this now even Mr. Hewitt cannot deny; for President Grant told him that the election of Mr. Tilden would be a national calamity. As for Mr. Cox, he may grin or he may weep over Mr. Tilden's defeat; it was the deliberate and direct act of the people from their knowledge of the man.

Nothing is more offensive to an intelligent American citizen than the commission of election frauds. How much intensified, therefore, must such a charge be, when brought home to the Democratic candidate for President? His connection with past election frauds cannot be obliterated, and there is a moral conviction that he has been guilty of inspiring or sanctioning the same kind of frauds to assist in his own election. The Congressional report on "Disbursements under the Registration Act," dated August 5, 1876, made by the Republican members of the committee, takes the bull by the horns, and says that whatever may have been the origin and purpose of the numerous Democratic investigations, they had long ago been perverted from their object, and that it was necessary to go back to the history of the gigantic election frauds in New York, "when Tammany ruled the city by means of money which Tweed accumulated and Samuel J. Tilden, as chairman of the State Democratic committee, disbursed it. * * * Tweed held the keys to the city Treasury, and Samuel J. Tilden was the cashier and general disbursing officer." Congress having passed the necessary laws the books of registration prepared by Mr. Davenport did much to prevent fraud. But if the recommendation of the Democrats on the committee had been accepted, against which Republicans protested, and the acts of Congress repealed, as was desired, it was said that "the repeal of those acts would again usher in the same state of fraud and corruption that existed under the reign of Tweed and Tilden before their passage."

The ominous part of the report was seen in connecting Mr. Tilden's name with the commission of frauds and corruption when he had the power. He had, then, it is true, but a common interest in the success of the Democratic party. But the publication of the report itself during the canvass was significant, and made many people tremble for the man who was then appealing to the country to elect him as its President, who had been guilty of inciting fraud at the previous election of a chief magistrate of a State. He had sent out instructions from the "Rooms of the Democratic State Committee" a circular asking that "some reliable" Democrat should be instructed to telegraph to William M. Tweed, Tammany Hall, at the minute of closing the polls, the reliable Democratic estimate of the vote, as follows:

"This town will show a Democratic gain (or loss) over last year of, (number;) or,

"This town will give a Republican or Democratic majority of — * * *

"SAMUEL J. TILDEN."

With the knowledge that the country has of the perpetration of Democratic frauds, it is further known that Mr. Tilden directed the canvass of his own election, and has been busily employed in manipulating since the vote was cast. He desired the office of President. Would such a man lose an opportunity of advancing his own interest, or hold the hand of a zealous friend from serving him from a sense of honor?

Such a course of procedure as had counted in Governor Hoffman was too valuable to be abandoned, and it is said that the same tactics were resorted to by Mr. Tilden and his Democratic friends during the recent election for the Presidency. Tammany Hall had managed to have its services accepted, and the Democratic managers went to work with the old enthusiasm, the old recklessness, the same determination to defy the will of the people, and render the use of the ballot a farce, a mockery, and a snare. Less than an hour after the polls were closed the Democratic manipulators who were hanging about the rooms obtained sufficient information from all the districts in the State to fill in the blank spaces of a circular the estimated number of votes that had been cast; and these numbers were telegraphed to the committee sitting in the city of New York. Then the scoundrelism commenced. Within a few of the actual number of votes that had been cast, the returns were received. These were placed in columns and summed up, and the Republican majority was seen with enough accuracy to enable the managers to manipulate the votes of the city of New York and King's county. The State had gone Republican beyond question; but it was necessary to steal the State bodily from the Republican victors, and hand it over silent and dishonored to the Democratic party on behalf of Tilden and Hendricks. To counteract the Republican majorities in the rural districts, the Democratic committee added to the Democratic votes a number large enough to overcome the Republican vote, and when that was done the vote of the city and the State might be publicly announced. The vote was announced, and then the world learned that all the honor, justice, intelligence of the people outside that great colony of ignorance, crime, and Romanism, New York city, had vanquished the Empire State. Tammany rejoiced at the feat it had accomplished, and Tilden, on whose behalf Tammany had worked and triumphed, accepted the vote of the State as if it really had been Democratic.

Can such a man ever be President? How have the votes of States been manufactured for Mr. Tilden's benefit? It makes one shudder to think that the formalities attendant upon the electoral college hide out of sight the great popular verdict. That verdict was for Hayes and Wheeler. Into the popular heart that verdict has sunk deep, and never were the people more sternly resolved that the Democratic party shall not commit a vaster robbery than that of Tweed, by robbing the nation of its choice for the Presidency, although Mr. Tilden was Mr. Tweed's friend!

REVOLUTIONARY DOCTRINE.—It is a novel proposition, set forth for the first time in American politics, that either House of Congress can determine the validity of the electoral vote of a State. This is centralization with a vengeance. Had the Republican party advanced this claim a Democratic howl would have gone up from Maine to California. When a State, through its prescribed forms, names the electors chosen, those names must stand, and to say that one branch of Congress can set them aside is to say that one branch can set aside the laws of a State and nullify the constitutional rights of its people. Never before has such a claim been advanced. To admit it as a valid one, is to give to one-half of Congress more power than our wisest statesmen ever claimed for both branches in their joint capacity. It is upon such revolutionary doctrine as this that Democracy demands the inauguration of Tilden.

THE ELECTORAL VOTE—CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY.

SPEECH OF HON. WILLIAM A. PHILLIPS, OF KANSAS, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, THURSDAY, JANUARY 4, 1877.

The House being as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas, said :

Mr. Chairman : Ever since this session began there has been a disposition to effervesce the moment a question touching in the most remote degree the late Presidential election came up. We are admonished by the belligerent spirit manifested by many on this floor that the political mind is in an unhealthy condition. Crude ideas of the powers of this House over the subject are entertained ; theories hastily jumped at are wildly expressed—theories generally utterly at variance with our history and fundamental law. One of the political parties in the country, long out of power, but which has succeeded in gaining possession of one branch of Congress, makes haste to arrogate to it all the powers of Government, legislative, executive, and judicial. Even men whose whole lives have been devoted to rigid constructions of the Constitution startle us by seeming to keep in countenance schemes which do not find a particle of color in that document, theories obnoxious to its framers and diametrically opposed to our earlier, better history.

I do not hesitate to pronounce these mischievous and revolutionary sentiments. And so are all the plans for compromise, bargain, or adjustment, other than the plain and simple methods pointed out by the Constitution. Nor do I hold in much higher estimation the numerous propositions to remodel the Constitution or add to it an amendment to be hurriedly adopted as a temporary expedient or used to bridge a real or imaginary emergency. It is not necessary to assume that the Constitution is faultless. Our experience has demonstrated that there are several desirable modifications and a necessity for clearer definition of details, whether these can be adopted or not. Yet every man of sagacity must feel that to take such steps for a special purpose, to meet a special case, above all to intervene between the verdict of the people, expressed under the forms of Constitution and law, and the mere declaration of the result according to the mode prescribed under the existing Constitution, is obnoxious on principle and dangerous as a precedent. As a mere practical question, every man knows that it cannot be done in time, even if it were a proper thing to do. All such propositions, therefore, so far as they are designed to affect this case, are simply disturbing elements. They affect to admit that which it is not necessary to admit, and only add flames to that political excitement which it should be the aim of every patriotic citizen to discourage. Neither can amendments to the Constitution be wisely undertaken under circumstances and at a time when partisan interests and partisan bitterness must deny them that impartial consideration which alone can confer on them utility and crowning glory.

It is, therefore, an unhappy circumstance that makes it appear as if many of our public men had lost their balance or were endeavoring to feed themselves with ideas impregnated with anarchy and revolution. It has been the pride of our Government and the hope of the lovers of republicanism everywhere that we are not as the South American republics. Indeed, I cannot for one moment admit that there is even in this House a majority who will sustain any proposition to elect a President by any other means than the constitutional forms. These latter may not go into all the details we could wish, but their purpose is sufficiently clear to answer the necessity. A departure from them at such a time is simply revolution, and I will not believe that this House will present itself to the country in an attitude so humiliating until partisan folly leaves us no alternative.

If there is any tendency toward political disease of this sort among Representatives, how is it with the people? It is undoubtedly true that a profound interest is manifested on the subject in the press and throughout the country. It is not fair or true to assume that the thousand and one schemes and theories announced make any serious impression on the public mind. In fact, it may be safely believed that the stability of character and purpose which has been the great pride of our Government and our people, rests like a deep and mighty sea beneath the light and frothy foam that fickle winds drive across its surface. The doctrinaire and the enthusiast are always on the skirmish line, and, whether their proposition be wise or otherwise, it is not safe to judge society by them. When we hear that a few of the lawyers of one city meet and speak and resolve that the times are "parlous," and that it is necessary for them to put their spoke in the wheel of Government, or that a few dozen of men calling themselves the business men of the country, and who are probably better politicians than business men, meet and resolve that "it is a crisis," and that they have a panacea for it, we are reminded of the convocation of nine tailors, who began their resolutions, "We, the people of England;" and they also remind every thinking man that their studies in political science have not taught them the dangers of revolutionary innovation. Nor can it be admitted that the public mind is so diseased that it could tolerate the mere victory of party, no matter how illustrious the party might be, at the sacrifice of the stability of the Government or the public tranquillity. I do not deny that I should look upon the election of Mr. Tilden and the triumph of a reactionary party as a great calamity, but not half so great as the election of a President by fraud or revolutionary proceedings.

The facts of the case are plain and simple. While more than two candidates were in the field no third or fourth candidate received a single State or electoral vote. Hayes or Tilden received them all, and as the electoral vote cannot be evenly divided one of them was of course elected. If the electoral vote could have been, and had been, equally divided there would have been no election, and the election of President would have gone to the House. But one of them was elected under the forms of the Constitution.

It might have been desirable that the majority should be larger, but it was not at all necessary. If a close result is to invite and justify revolutionary proceedings there is an end of Republican government. Does any one for an instant think that, if there had not been a Democratic majority in this House, there would have been an attempt or even a thought of trying to create confusion and throw the election into the House of Representatives? Is there one man of intelligence who reveres the Constitution who believes that the House has the slightest authority for pretending to select a President when it is an indisputable and positive fact that one man was certainly elected?

We may dislike the machinery by which the result was determined in some States. We may have no faith in some of the State governments. We may even have a poor opinion of the people of some States. We did not make the latter, and it is doubtful if they would have been any better if we had. The State governments are supposed to have at least some powers reserved to them, and I am amazed at any one on the other side of the House for calling them in question. The world witnesses the extraordinary spectacle of a party, fresh from a great war and rebellion, into which they entered under an extreme view of State rights, clutching at the ghost of a coveted victory by sacrificing the last remnant of State rights, which no party has ever before dared to call in question. Do they object to reconstruction? Do they hold with Mr. O'Connor that when the Union army marched on Richmond the Constitution was forever broken, or do they hold that all that has happened since has been a chapter of war and violence and intrigue expedient to gain time and power? I think not. I believe patriotic gentlemen on the other side of this chamber who took the oath on this floor to support the Constitution meant honestly and honorably all they said. It behooves them to remember that, whatever faults reconstruction may have had or with whatever errors they may be inclined to charge it, but for reconstruction many of them would never have been here. Is it for them to break the pedestal on which they stand? Is it for them to benefit by just so much of it as may serve their party purposes? I believe they are wiser and shrewder men than to do that.

There are many now in our party who believed that when a State failed to maintain a government loyal to the Union, and went to war against it, there was of necessity an end of its powers as a State in the Union, and as it was an integral portion of the territory of the United States that it should be treated as territory, and, when it could safely be done, that a territorial government of limited powers be given it until there was sufficient evidence that it could come in as a peaceful, loyal Union State. That plan was not adopted. There was in the minds of a number a horror of losing sight of the idea of an existing autonomy of all the States. To get rid of the war, which was a hard, incontrovertible fact, a fiction was resorted to, and on this plan of reconstruction, the most generous and liberal to those States, they were admitted to full fellowship and power. For the wisdom of that plan posterity will judge us. They will judge us when passion and sentiment and partisan bitterness have all passed away. We look to you gentlemen of the reconstructed States for a vindication of the magnanimous policy that gave you your power. It is for you to show to your country and the world that our course was not a rash experiment, and that your acceptance of the situation was honest and made with an honorable intention to carry gone other than Republican. I would quote from the report of the committee of last year, of which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Boutwell] was chairman; but I do not wish at this time to aggravate the sensibilities of my hearers or excite fresh feeling by repeating its horrors. It is enough to quote from the report that the Democracy of Mississippi "at last have gained supremacy in the State by acts of violence, fraud, and murder, fraught with more than all the horrors of open war, without its honor, dignity, generosity, or justice." The measures suggested as remedies are given, one of which is to deny a State in anarchy or controlled by bodies of armed men representation in Congress. Another is to remand States where such disorders exist to a territorial condition.

Of the election in that State last November I will give but one specimen. Our friend from the sixth district of Mississippi was elected to this Congress by 18,000 majority, as I have been informed. Last November he was defeated or, as he says, "counted out" by 5,000 majority. Is there not something astounding in such a change? Can it be accounted for on any reasonable hypothesis? Has not the thing been so much overdone as to startle us as to the meaning of what they called an election there? Is it not a revolution, varying only in its mode of operation from the revolution that sought to overthrow the Union? It has been stated on this floor on the evidence of General Sheridan that there were three thousand political murders in Louisiana, and that nearly that number of colored voters were slain.

Are we then to consider the region we tried to reconstruct in a state of anarchy? Shall we throw out the votes and reject the representation from Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, South Carolina, and shall we examine the vote of North Carolina?

And this brings us directly to the main question, what are the powers of Congress on the subject? Has either House or both the right to say that any portion of the vote of a State shall be accepted or rejected? Has Congress the right to act as a returning board to purge the vote of any or all States? Was this power conferred on it by the Constitution? Would it have been wise to so confer it?

In article 2 of the Constitution it is simply provided that "each State may appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct," such electors as it is entitled to. In the same article Congress is given the power to determine the time when the electors shall be chosen and the day on which they shall cast their votes, and these for an obvious reason, and that time and that place are elements in the legality of such electoral vote. Both Houses are to be present when the President of the Senate, who is the custodian of the votes, shall open the votes and count them, as witnesses, and no other powers are given them over the electoral vote or over the question, unless there is a tie or no one has a majority.

The language of the Constitution is therefore plain. As the Constitution originally stood the electors made a list of the votes and sent it with a certificate to the President of the Senate, who was the custodian of the returns.

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

As it now stands in article 12, the electors meet in their respective States and ballot for President and Vice President. They make distinct lists of persons voted for by the electors, but are not required to show the State vote. They certify these distinct lists and signing them send them to the President of the Senate, who is the custodian; and in the same manner as it originally stood the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, opens all the certificates and the votes are then counted. Does the President of the Senate open and does some one else count? Certainly not. There may be tellers, but they have certainly no judicial functions, whether he has or not. If there is any doubt on that point the early practice ought to determine it.

In September, 1787, the Constitution was submitted to the Legislatures of the several States for adoption, and among others the following resolution was adopted by the convention:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this convention that, as soon as the conventions of nine States shall have ratified this Constitution, the United States in Congress assembled should fix a day on which electors should be appointed by the States which shall have ratified the same, and a day on which the electors should assemble to vote for the President, and the time and place for commencing proceeding under the Constitution. That after such publication the electors should be appointed and the Senators and Representatives elected; that the electors should meet on the day fixed for the election of the President, and should transmit their votes—certified, sealed, and directed as the Constitution requires—to the Secretary of the United States in Congress assembled; that the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned; that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President; and that after he shall be chosen the Congress, together with the President, should without delay proceed to execute this Constitution.

The above is no carelessly worded resolution, but attests the precision and skill of Franklin, Hamilton, and Madison,

On the 6th of April, 1789, Congress having assembled under the Constitution, ordered "That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice President of the United States, and that the Senate is now ready in the Senate chamber to proceed, in the presence of the House, to discharge that duty, and that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared, submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their number for the like purpose," who reported that he "had delivered the message." A message was received from the House, as follows:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that the House is ready forthwith to meet the Senate, to attend the opening and counting of the votes of the electors of the President and Vice President of the United States.

John Langdon was duly elected by the Senate as President of the Senate, and the record declares:

MONDAY, April 6, 1789.

The President of the Senate, elected for the purpose of counting the votes, declared to the Senate that the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes for electors for President and Vice President of the United States; whereby it appears that George Washington was unanimously elected President.

The record shows that of the thirteen Colonies ten had voted, namely, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, South Carolina, and Georgia. Sixty-nine electoral votes were cast. It will be noticed that New York had ratified the Constitution on the 26th of July, 1788, nine months before, but had no electoral vote there. North Carolina did not ratify the Constitution until seven months after this election, on the 21st of November, 1789, and Rhode Island not until May 29, 1790.

It will thus be seen that these men, who were the framers of the Constitution, conferred all power of opening, counting, and declaring the vote on the President of the Senate. The two Houses were merely the witnesses to give force and dignity to the event. The tellers were only the recording witnesses for that purpose, as the President of the Senate declared the vote.

At the second election of Washington a joint resolution of both Houses was adopted, as follows:

That the two Houses shall assemble in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday next at 12 o'clock; that one teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Resolutions nearly the same, word for word, were adopted from the first elections until a very recent period. At the first election of Jefferson, when he and Aaron Burr had seventy-three votes each, the following words were interpolated in the resolutions: "And if it shall appear that a choice hath been made agreeably to the Constitution." That election forced the amendment of the Constitution by which the President and Vice President should be voted for separately, instead of taking the second on the list for Vice President. Jefferson and Burr had the same vote, not that the people intended to elect Burr, but because the design was to elect Jefferson President and Burr Vice President. The elder Adams at that election had sixty-five votes, and Mr. Pinckney sixty-four, which shows that the Federalists managed it better by keeping Mr. Pinckney one vote behind Mr. Adams. At the opening of the electoral votes on that occasion, the Vice President, who was President of the Senate, was Thomas Jefferson, himself the candidate for the Presidency. With a feeling of delicacy he opened the sealed envelopes and handed them to the tellers to count, although the resolution under which he acted, and the Constitution, made it simply his work. The tellers in that matter were his assistants.

On that occasion, and the only other occasion when the election went to the House, the dangers of the system presented themselves. No one doubted for a moment that the people intended to elect Thomas Jefferson President; and yet, as the Constitution then stood, the election was thrown into the House, the House showed what kind of an electoral college it was capable of making. On the 11th of February, 1801, it voted nineteen times, and Jefferson, who had carried 73 out of 138 electoral votes, got but eight States; nine were necessary to a choice. One whole week was spent in balloting before Jefferson was elected. It is not for us to listen to or believe all the current stories rife at that time in the public mind of intrigue, bargain, or sale. I would only refer to a speech of Mr. Bayard, of Delaware, made in February, 1802, to be found on page 417 of Debates on the Judiciary. It exposed the system of electing by the House and the House itself to severe criticism. And here let us admire the good features of the electoral system. There is no national electoral college; no body to assemble in Washington to vote for President; no body possessed of a discretionary power to reverse the decree of the people; no body to be tempted by the eminent places of the Government, where a few votes or one vote might change the result.

The electoral college is purely in and for the State. The law of Congress designates when they shall be elected and when they shall meet. The Constitution fixes the representation. It provides that one copy of the returns shall be sent to the President of the Senate. So much importance is attached to these returns that by the act of 1792 it was provided that other two copies should be made. One goes to the nearest judge, to be held by him as security for their preservation, and besides the copy sent by mail one is sent by special messenger, both to the President of the Senate. The messenger has no authority save to bring the returns, which are sealed, in his possession. The President of the Senate receives the certificate of the State electoral college. He is the custodian. In case both the copy from the messenger and by mail are lost or not received by the first Wednesday of January, the Secretary of State sends a messenger for the copy in the hands of the judge.

I have said that there was no perceptible change in form of the joint resolution adopted by both Houses for counting the electoral vote until a very recent period. That period was the second election of Mr. Lincoln. At that time, in the Senate, February 6, 1865, Hon. Lyman Trumbull, then a Senator of the United States, reported the joint rule the first part of which reads as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring therein,) That the following be added to the joint rules of the two Houses, namely: "The two Houses shall assemble in the hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock P. M., on the second Wednesday in February next succeeding the meeting of the electors of President and Vice President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer; one teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes, and said tellers having read the same in the presence of the two Houses then assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates, and the votes having been counted the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote, and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses."

It will be at once seen that there is a very remarkable change of form, and one interfering with the functions of the President of the Senate. Formerly tellers had been appointed, and on many occasions the President of the Senate handed them the certificates to count. This resolution conferred on them the power from Congress. When the portion I have quoted was read, Mr. Trumbull said, (page 608, volume 54, Congressional Globe:)

That is the usual form, as far as I have read, of the resolutions heretofore adopted. The committee have proceeded further to provide for a contingency.

Let us see whether it was the usual form. It is singular that Mr. Trumbull was also chairman of the committee that reported the resolution at the first election of Mr. Lincoln. That resolution was in the usual form adopted since the second election, and reads:

Resolved, That the two Houses will assemble in the chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 13th day of February, 1861, at 12 o'clock, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that one teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to make a list of votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, shall be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

As a matter of fact, the precise mode of counting the vote has varied. At first, under resolutions very carefully framed by the authors of the Constitution, the President of the Senate was the sole actor in counting the vote. Afterward a number of Vice Presidents were either candidates for re-election or candidates for the Presidency, and as a question of delicacy they handed the returns, when they opened the certificates in their possession, to the tellers. The functions of the tellers, however, have always been purely those of assistants to the President of the Senate. The function of counting may be said to have been always purely ministerial. If any function of a judicial character was vested anywhere it was, of course, in the President of the Senate. There is a natural repugnance to putting into the hands of one man the power to settle a great question, and yet it is clearly certain, by the language of the Constitution and of the first resolution, and, above all, by the debates in the old constitutional convention, as recorded in the Madison papers, that there was a fixed purpose that Congress should have no control over the Presidential election until the President of the Senate declared that there was no election under the terms of the Constitution.

The mode of electing a President was one of the vexed questions of that old constitutional convention. None of the colonies when they became States wished its influence weakened or destroyed. There were two parties then as now, a national party and a State-rights party. The former wished a National Government, entirely distinct from and independent of the States and President elected either by Congress or the people directly; the latter party wished the Chief Magistrate selected by the States as such. So intense was the feeling on this subject that at one time it threatened to destroy all hope of uniting on a form of government. Neither side succeeded, or rather the result was a compromise. The electors for the districts represented the people, the senatorial electors the States, and yet the electors might be voted for by the people, elected by the Legislature, or appointed by the governor under authority of law. The electoral colleges were State colleges. All supposed corrupt influences were avoided. The steps taken to have the electoral vote polled and sent were supposed to be taken with great care. The President of the Senate received, opened, and counted the vote, and his declaration of the result was held as final and sufficient. Counting or rejecting the votes of States was a contingency never contemplated, and for which, of course, there was no provision. It was never intended that Congress should make itself a returning board to canvass a State election, and determine which States should or should not be counted, because it was foreseen that if they did it would not be long before the congressional machinery would elect all Presidents. Some little discretion was undoubtedly understood to vest in the President of the Senate. As a matter of course he would not receive returns from everybody. He must be satisfied they were the genuine returns. If he was assisted by tellers he never asked them and they never asked him whether the package he handed them as the vote of a certain State was such a vote or not. Their acts were plain and simple.

Neither is there a word to countenance the idea of a joint convention with legislative and judicial powers "in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives." Both bodies together and yet both bodies distinct. The disposition to convert the witness into a judge was to be expected. The tendency in that direction is very strong. If the Constitution conferred the necessary power on the President of the Senate, it did not confer it on the House. Shall the witness called in first raise a question and then decide upon it? Is it safe to give Congress the power of receiving or rejecting the votes of States? Is it necessary that it should furnish a law or machinery to this end? Is doing this so inevitable that the power to "make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers" confers it on Congress? If we accept that claim in its broadest sense there is nothing which Congress may not do.

I am not insensible to a necessity which may arise calling for congressional interference. I am equally impressed with the danger of innovations which may lead the way to a complete overthrow of the old system. I do not know that precedents are worth much in the face of constitutional provision, yet let us beware of the precedents we make.

What are the precedents made? In 1821 Mr. Livermore, of New Hampshire, objected to the vote of Missouri because Missouri was not a State in the Union. The Houses separated and a vote to count the vote of the State of Missouri was laid on the table. A resolution had been adopted that if the counting or omitting to count the vote of the State of Missouri would not change the result it should be announced: "With the vote of the State of Missouri, so much, without the vote of the State of Missouri, so much;" in either event — is elected President.

In February, 1813, when Mr. Monroe was elected President, Mr. Taylor, a member from New York, objected because "the votes of the electors of the State of Indiana for President and Vice President had been given previous to the admission of the State into the Union." When the Houses separated they promptly voted to count Indiana, and the vote is registered like the other States.

In February, 1837, objection was made to the State of Michigan, and a resolution to announce the vote as in the case of Missouri was agreed to in joint resolution before the two Houses met. The President of the Senate declared the result: "With the vote of Michigan Martin Van Buren has 170 votes; without it, 167;" and as 148 was a majority he was elected President.

At the election February, 1837, the question of the ineligibility of electors came up. From the resolution of Mr. Grundy and the other records of the transactions it appears that the second section of the second article was supposed not to have been very rigidly observed. From the report made by Mr. Grundy to the Senate it appears that there were five cases at that election of electors who were deputy postmasters or other Federal officers. We quote from it:

What ought to be done with them, and whether any and, what provision ought to be made for securing the faithful observance in future of that section of the Constitution.

Also :

The committee cannot adopt the opinion entertained by some that a single illegal vote would vitiate the whole electoral vote of the college of electors in which it was given, particularly in cases when the vote of the whole college has been given for the same person.

And the following :

Should a case occur in which it became necessary to ascertain and determine the qualifications of electors of President and Vice President of the United States, the important question would be presented, what tribunal would, under the Constitution, be competent to decide? Whether the respective colleges of electors in the different States should decide upon the qualifications of their own members, or Congress should exercise the power, is a question which the committee are of opinion ought to be settled by a permanent provision on the subject.

It was not permanently settled, however. Constitutional amendments relating to the election of President have been found difficult to obtain. The same difficulties that existed during the first convention exist still. In both cases when the election went to the House it was followed by popular clamor for amendments to the Constitution. In the first instance, when it was merely on voting on President and Vice President separately, it was easily obtained, but when it touched the essential points the amendment was lost.

At the election of Mr. Buchanan, February, 1857, after the President pro tempore had declared the result, Mr. Humphrey Marshall, a member of the House, raised the question "as to the right of the President of the Senate pro tempore to determine whether or not the State of Wisconsin had cast a vote that could be counted." He had counted it on his own volition, and having declared the result, adjourned the meeting of the two Houses.

The Houses separated. The tellers reported to them that the electors, instead of meeting on the 3d of December, the day fixed by law under provision of the Constitution, they met and cast their vote on the 4th, the day after. On this report of the tellers no action was taken, the Senate evidently being disinclined to take action as to the powers of the President of the Senate. This, too, was in a case of violation of act of Congress on one of the two only points on which Congress expressly has power under the Constitution; the one to fix the day for the election of electors, the other that they fix the day on which they shall meet and cast their vote.

It was not until the second election of Mr. Lincoln occurred that graver questions arose. War was still raging. Should States at war be permitted to vote, or should the States under the control of the Federal armies or Government, in process of reconstruction, be permitted to vote? Under these circumstances legislation to prevent the counting of such votes, or of rejecting the vote of any State, was for the first time undertaken, and the twenty-second joint rule was also adopted.

I cannot conceive that any statesman should take any other view of many of the provisions of the twenty-second joint rule save as necessary war measures. Of the necessity and absolute force of such action under such circumstances no question can be had, yet it was not done under any constitutional provision. When the imperative causes for such action are removed, are we to determine that they shall enter into future Presidential elections? Was this the design or expectation, or are we warranted in adding this to the powers of Congress? The most objectionable feature of the twenty-second joint rule, as it stood, was that it permitted one House of Congress to disfranchise a State. If we are to adopt legislation to meet difficulties, real or imaginary, no State should be deprived of the power of voting but by the concurrent action of both Houses. On this very point the ablest Democratic Senators were eloquent last session.

It will be observed that the Presidential elector is one of the few officers whose eligibility there is no tribunal to inquire into. The right of every other person to the position he claims may be judicially determined. It is clearly a State office. "Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct." The Legislature may elect them. They may authorize the Governor to appoint them. The law of the State has entire control of their mode of appointment. Their vote is sealed, but that merely refers to being put in a sealed package. No appendage of State seals is required. If present they are surplusage, merely for better identification.

I think there is but one course to pursue in this Presidential matter, to go straight ahead under the forms of the Constitution. The two Houses are to be present when the officer who has the authority under the Constitution opens the certificates, counts the votes, and declares the result. They do not meet to make motions, offer resolutions, or vote. They do not meet to determine that the President of the Senate shall not do that which the Constitution has said he shall do. Does the withdrawal of each body to its own chamber to vote give either House any more power than both have jointly to enact a law? Is there a single matter in legislation which they can determine separately? Has the House judicial powers on any subject, or has the Senate on counting the electoral vote? These are questions for us to ponder and answer.

I think it must be admitted that to give Congress the power to fill up by legislation the supposed gaps in the Constitution, and in doing so to add to its own powers in electing a President, is a matter of questionable expediency. Where is it to end? The ancient landmarks may not be all we could wish them, but where is to be our safe anchorage when we have swept them away? In the interests of a quiet and peaceable adjustment of this question we might consent to yield anything not fundamental. I have no desire to be captious or hang on mere technicalities. If, under the Constitution we have the power to determine anything, let us do it in a spirit rising above all party or its interests and above the claims of all candidates; yet, before we embark on such a course let us think of the difficulty of harmonizing legislation at such a time. Compromise, always of questionable utility, never had such a difficult task before it.

Are the supposed difficulties really entitled to the great interest they have aroused? I must confess I cannot dismiss the idea from my mind that a large portion of excitement and disturbance is caused by those who expect to divert attention from the only legitimate and constitutional modes of settling the question. They wish to drive Congress to some new and unauthorized mode for the sake of peace. Such proposals are the only things that can disturb the public tranquillity. Those who resort to them ought to receive the condemnation of all good citizens. Nor is there anything necessarily startling in the situation. One majority is, to all intents and purposes, as good as fifty. Nor can there be any serious doubt as to which are the State returns. It is in some respects new in the aspects it presents, and yet the crowning test to our institutions. Must close elections be followed by intrigue and violence to change the result? Does any man for a moment suppose that a scheme so monstrous as the attempt to defeat the fair and unmistakable election in Oregon on a mere technicality could be for one moment tolerated by the American people, even if the technicality had, what it has not, the slightest color of law?

The question as to whether we should allow such of the reconstructed States, recently in war, and who do not furnish us the evidence that they are able as yet to conduct fair and peaceable elections, to vote, is one pregnant with the most important issues. Must we forever be kept in this condition of half war, half peace? Shall we permit wholesale fraud and murder to elect a President? or, having admitted them, shall we accept such machinery as these States present to us, and count the vote of Vermont side by side with the vote of Mississippi?

What are we to think of a great party like the Democratic party resorting to turbulent means from a fear that they are beaten? How questionable and unpatriotic to call popular assemblages to pass on the situation. What shall the Democratic convention of Indiana do? Are they not satisfied with the constitutional machinery that has elected our Presidents since the days of Washington? Is the design to browbeat or threaten? The will of the people is law, but in our American system its only force lies through forms; for nothing is law, or can have the sanctity thereof, save the will of the people legitimately expressed. The only turbulent element is in such movements. Will the shrewd Democratic leaders countenance such a scheme in the vain hope of a temporary success?

I do not wish to hear any of the insane talk of fixed ammunition and thousands of muskets in the hands of mobs to intimidate or assail our constitutional authorities. All such rodomontade only exposes those who use it to ridicule. Nor do I for a moment fear that armies will be lawlessly organized to march on Washington, prepared and preparing for disturbances. If such talk for a moment disturbs the public mind, it is at once tranquilized by the reflection that we have a man at the helm. No weak, vacillating old man is declaring he has no power to crush conspiracy and rebellion, and weeping himself out of the Presidency. I do not rise here as the special eulogist of the President, but I do not hesitate to declare him among the best of our Presidents. Vainly shall conspirators seek to weaken his influence. Cruelly assailed, he has modestly withheld just, but possibly undignified vindication. For long months remorselessly pursued by men, many of whom were recently in arms against him, and who had shared his unparalleled magnanimity when, at the head of a great army, flushed with victory, his only thought was—

To soothe and save
The feelings of the conquered brave.

Misrepresented and hounded by partisan committees, his character comes out of the ordeal unspotted. He is charged with Cæsarism, and events prove the charge false. He is charged with conspiring to name his successor so that his dynasty might be continued, and as events prove that to be false he is charged with selfish indifference as to the candidates of his own party. He is charged with sending troops into the reconstructed States, and yet he never sent them save under the strict forms of the Constitution and law. Were they asked for needlessly? Let Hamburgh and kindred horrors answer. Something was due the sanctity of law, something to the blood of our slaughtered countrymen.

Yes, we will have peace. The President the people have elected under the prescribed forms will be quietly inaugurated. We have proven to the world that rebellion could not destroy this Republic, and we will now prove that intrigue cannot accomplish what war failed to do. The forms by which we have maintained our Government are sacred, and rest under the ægis of the Constitution. Behind it stands the American people, and as they have never permitted an armed enemy to crush, so will they never permit bargain to compromise or treason to tarnish.

A SAMPLE OF THOUSANDS.

The people of the North have but a faint conception of the lawlessness existing in certain sections of Louisiana. If the facts were known men of all parties would rise up and say with emphasis, this reign of terror must cease. The question is asked, Why does the Governor permit these outrages—why do not the courts punish the offenders? The answer is a simple one. The Governor has the white element of the State arrayed against him, and this element tolerates the commission of these crimes. The courts in certain parishes are overawed by armed desperadoes and have no power to execute their decrees. Justice is but a mockery, and officers of the law are defied or shot down. To kill a negro or a Republican, white or black, is no crime in the eyes of the Democrats in some of the parishes of the State. Think of it, citizens of this boasted land of liberty! Citizens of a State outraged because they are Republicans; driven to seek refuge in woods and swamps because they are Republicans; murdered in the presence of their wives and children because they are Republicans; treated worse than wild beasts for no other cause than that of their loyalty to the Union and the Republican party. The devotion shown by the colored people of the South to the Republican party is little less than martyrdom.

The Republican party has had control of the nation, but through a mistaken policy it has stood with folded arms and witnessed the persecution of its friends in the South without any effort to protect them. They have been left to the mercy of their enemies, and yet they are true to the party that represents liberty. Peace, work, money, have been held out to them if they would but vote the Democratic ticket. In some cases they have yielded to save home and life, but in many instances they have gone to their death, sublimely heroic, rather than deny their political birthright. To show a single instance, taken from a volume of testimony in the same direction, and published by Congress in the shape of a report on Louisiana affairs, we append the following statement. It shows clearly the cold-blooded character of the lawless Democrats in Louisiana, who to-day are savage with rage that the returning board had the nerve to reject the votes that were cast under the shadow of the rifle and knife. Riley Norfliss, a colored man, twenty-four years old, a farmer at West Feliciana, testified before the board as follows:

“The 11th of July last past, about midnight, a body of armed men came to my house, about sixty, as near as I could count. They called out to me some three or four times to come out, then, getting impatient, called again, ‘Ain’t you coming out?’ I answered yes, as soon as I could find my pants. They then said, ‘If you don’t come out we will smoke you out.’ I went out, and there I saw Cody Smith, Mr. Domings, Robert Wilson, Tom West, Charley Barrow, Robert Phillips, Hugh Connor, Geo. Townes, Will. Gilmore, Matt. Gilmore, Joe D. Smith, Lewis Smith, Page Barrow, Herman Barrow, and a great many whose names I do not now remember, and some I did not know. All were on horseback, and were armed with guns and pistols. They had dismounted. I was accosted at once by Cody Smith, who said, ‘I want to know all about that club, Republican, you have out here that is going to kill the Democrats.’ I told him that was a club I didn’t know anything about. He says, ‘You are a damned liar. You follow us all. We'll get it out of you to-night or we'll kill you.' They then got on their horses and made me go with them on foot in their midst, about 250 yards from my house, where they came across a big tree. There they made me get up upon a horse. Then Tom West said to me, 'Now, by G—d, I want you to tell me all you know.' I told them I didn't know anything. West said, 'Yes you do, by G—d. Ain't some of you got a rope?' Then Robert Phillips spoke up, saying, 'Yes, I've got one.' He then passed to West a new grass rope that he had tied to his saddle. West immediately put it around my neck, after making the slip-noose, saying, 'Now, by G—d, I want you to up and tell us the whole thing. If you don't we'll break your neck to-night.' I told them I knew of no club of Republicans to kill people. The boys had spoke of having a club meeting, as had always been the case in all election times. Robert Wilson spoke, saying, 'Oh, by G—d, boys, he is trying to dodge us. Break his neck at once and be done with it.' Robert Phillips then climbed the tree, taking up the end of the rope, and fastened it to a limb. Lewis Smith then caught hold of the bridle-rein of the horse I had been placed on and started to lead him from under me. I caught hold of the rein and pulled him back. I begged for a chance to talk. They waited. I told them I did not know of such a club as they spoke of, but if they would turn me loose I would join a Democratic club. One of them then said, 'Turn him loose. Let him go home and behave himself and be a good Democrat now.' They turned me loose. After I had got off about one hundred yards one of them shouted out, 'Hold on there, you black son of a b—h, we ain't done with you yet.' I saw I had no chance to run, so stopped right still. Cody Smith, Robert Wilson, and Hugh Connor, Robert Phillips, and Lewis Smith came back for me and told me to go and follow them. They put me in advance, and being too slow in walking for them, Wilson said to Smith, 'If you've got a whip, whip him with it, and make him go faster. If you have not a whip get a stick and knock him in the head. He'll go then.' They took me to Charley Barrow's place, a mile from my house. They went into his quarters and took two other colored men, named Gilbert Carter and Isaac Vessell, and brought them to where I had been left with a guard over me, about a hundred yards from the quarters. When they had got Carter and Vessell within about ten yards of me, the white men said to each other, 'Where can we find a tree to hang these two sons of bitches? When they said this Carter and Vessell broke and ran. The whole crowd immediately fired after them. Gilbert Carter was filled with buck-shot in the small of the back, and his thigh was broken. The other man escaped. Robert Phillips rode up to where Carter had fallen and said, 'Boys, by G—d, this fellow's pulse is beating yet.' Then Charley Barrow went up to Carter and placing a pistol to his head, fired it and killed him dead, saying, 'By God, we've got the captain of this Republican club, and if he ain't religious he's gone to hell.' They then said to each other, 'What shall we do to this other?' meaning me. Hugh Connor says, 'Kill him and leave him here.' The guards who had me in charge said, 'No, we will take him to the captain and see what he says.' They carried me to the captain, and when we got to him I found it was Charley Barrow. He told them—he gave me to them and said, 'Do whatever you want to with him. He belongs to the Sage Hill club, he don't belong to mine.' He permitted me to talk to him. I said, 'I don't belong to anybody's club, but if you will turn me loose and don't hurt me I'll join your Democratic club.' He said, 'By G—d, you needn't expect to join my club and then after join the Radical club, for you will be in a worse fix if you do than you are now. If you join our club you must vote the Democratic ticket, for if you vote any other you might just as well take your carpet-bag on your back and travel. All Radicals now are played out. We are all Democrats now. You tell all others and colored men that if in two weeks they have not joined my club they will be sorry for their own selves. They had better leave the parish.' They then let me go, telling me to get home as quick as possible, and not let them catch me before I got home, for if they did they would kill me sure. From that time up to election they rode over the whole parish, threatening the lives of the people unless they voted the Democratic ticket. They done it night and day."

NOT EASILY FRIGHTENED.—The American people are not easily frightened out of their just rights. If Mr. Hayes is declared elected by the President of the Senate, under the forms of the Constitution, he will be inaugurated, and the better portion of the Democratic party will say, Amen!

FORTUNATE.—It is fortunate for the Republic that the Democratic ballot-box stuffer who can vote forty times can shoulder but one musket.

"A CONGRESS PRESIDENT."

HOSTILITY TO AN ELECTION BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES A FUNDAMENTAL DOCTRINE OF DEMOCRACY.

In the Presidential election of 1824 the primary colleges failed to elect a President. Before the people there had been four candidates, to wit :

	Who received
Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee	99 votes
John Q. Adams, of Massachusetts	84 "
Wm. H. Crawford, of Georgia	41 "
Henry Clay, of Kentucky,	37 "

The whole number of electors being 261

And a majority 131

Consequently, the election of a President, under the Constitution, devolved upon the House of Representatives, from the three highest on the list—Messrs. Jackson, Adams, and Crawford. The contest really was between Jackson and Adams. At the time Henry Clay was Speaker of the House. He possessed a commanding influence over that body, and exerting it in favor of Mr. Adams, decided the election in favor of Mr. Adams. The election of Adams excited the wildest indignation among the Democracy. They saw in the election of a President by the House of Representatives a destruction of the sovereignty of the nation—a degradation and collapse of our free institutions—a subversion of the fundamental principle of the Constitution, which declares that a majority shall rule. In the electoral colleges Jackson had 99 votes, and Adams but 84. They contended, therefore, that Jackson, having the largest number, was the choice of the people, and entitled to the Presidency. His defeat could only be the result of a corrupt combination, animated by the vilest motives—of "bargain and intrigue." Adams, Clay and the House were accordingly overwhelmed in furious anathemas.

Democracy, with an instinct for the spoils as irrepressible then as now, instantly assumed, rather arbitrarily, it was thought, that the Republican or Democratic party in the election had voted for Jefferson as President and Burr as Vice President ; and upon such an assumption they demanded Jefferson's election. They denounced the delay of the House in declaring him President. They threatened revolution and the most terrible vengeance if Jefferson was defeated, and vituperated Bayard, of Delaware, (a Federalist preferring Burr, and holding the decision in his hands,) because he hesitated in deciding the contest, against his convictions, in favor of Jefferson.

Hence, in 1825, the Democracy, now under the lead of Jackson, adopted as a fundamental principle of its organization undying hostility to elections by the House of Representatives of President of the United States. They determined upon an immediate revolution. Mr. Benton, in the Senate, and Governor McDuffie, of South Carolina, in the House, moved for an amendment to the Constitution which would divest the latter body, in every event, of all control over the election of President.

In the protracted and eloquent debate which followed in both Houses, these motions were supported by the ablest and most distinguished of the Democratic leaders—by Messrs. Benton, Hayne of South Carolina, R. M. Johnson of Kentucky, Martin Van Buren, James Buchanan, C. C. Cambelling, James K. Polk, J. S. Barbour, of Virginia, and others, and finally passed the House by a vote of yeas 138 to nays 52.

These gentlemen maintained that all experience demonstrates that the power lodged in the House to elect in a certain contingency is corrupt and corrupting ; it threatens the sovereignty of the nation in a probable defeat of the will of the people ; it frustrates the manifest design of the Constitution, which contemplates that in all cases a majority shall rule—the will of a majority legally expressed, without intimidation, violence, force, or fraud in the choice of a President. They maintained that the President of the Constitution is a President of the people; that a "Congress President," a President elected by the House, was a political monster execrated by the people. Such a President was a menace to the liberties of the nation—his "creation" an usurpation in Congress of the sovereignty of the people. Besides, the exercise of such a power by the House necessarily destroys all the salutary checks contemplated in the Constitution by the framers of that instrument for the purity of the Government.

"Responsibility" is the very essence, "the vital principle" of our constitutional system; upon it depends our "safety from anarchy and despotism." Hence the danger of a participation of the House in the election of President; it destroys "that separation of the legislative from the executive indispensable to the effective responsibility of the latter." "What," they exclaimed, "a Congress President! Who makes him—'we, the people of the United States?' No, sir; we, the servants of the people, a grade of workmen below the journeyman, fixes him up; the master hand is not in the work. Who is he responsible to"—to the people or Congress? Who but to those who made him—to Congress? And what the inevitable result? Intrigue and faction, the opening wide of the flood-gates of corruption through the "barter and sale" of patronage. Congress, "instead of enforcing a very vigorous accountability against the President of its own creation," "instead of standing to the executive in the relation of an independent and co-ordinate department, becomes the partisan of his power and the apologist of his transgressions."

They urged that "the tide of corruption never flows backward." "Corrupt Congress and you assail liberty in the very seat of its vitality;" for corruption, not force, was the destroyer of all free governments. The participation of the House in the election of President necessarily degrades alike the Legislature and the Executive. In the language of Governor McDuffie: "Instead of statesmen profoundly versed in the sublime art of rendering the Republic flourishing and happy, the members of this House will degenerate into mere managing politicians trained in the little arts of intrigue"—"engrossed exclusively in making Presidents." Truly, what a faithful description of the last and the present House. Upon "mercenary intriguers" and "interested office hunters"—the Tildens, Hewitts, Randalls, etc.—Governor McDuffie was very severe. He says:

"In political affairs the vicious, the ambitious, and the interested are always active. It is the natural tendency of virtue, confiding in the strength of its own cause, to be inactive." * * * "Show me a hundred political factionists—men who look to the election of a President as the means of gratifying their high or low ambition, and I will show you the very materials for a mob, ready for any desperate adventure connected with their common fortunes."

Hence, Governor McDuffie looked upon the interference by the House in the election of President in any event "with perfect abhorrence." The "abhorrence" of James K. Polk was equally pronounced; and James Buchanan had even an amendment of his own for ridding the Constitution and country of an abomination so monstrous; he would not tolerate it, nor would the people. He and they demanded that the constitutional clause conveying the power to the House be expunged. So, too, Van Buren declared: "Upon no point were the people so united;" and Richard M. Johnson "in vain expected to see a President elected by Congress hailed as the President of the nation." "In no event" would he vote to continue in the House a power so anti-Democratic and vicious, and Mr. Benton "pledged himself to the Senate and the American people" to persevere in the movement "with all the energy he was master of."

In the subsequent campaign of 1828, in which Andrew Jackson was elected President, hostility to an election of President by the House entered largely into the canvass, and was advocated by the Democracy as one of their cardinal or fundamental notions of reform. The Democratic orators were great upon the theme. In the sublimities of the subject their "patriotism transcended all party." In Congress, in the State legislatures, in the press, upon the stump, and even in the pulpit, their philippics on an election of President by the House abounded in eloquence and fire. Jackson indorsed their utterances. A genuine patriot, Jackson heartily believed in the principles they proclaimed. Hence, in every one of his eight annual messages to Congress, Jackson earnestly recommends the adoption of such an amendment to the Constitution as will sever forever the corrupt, corrupting, and dangerous connection of the House with the election of a President in every contingency.

Why, now, do the Democracy plot to consummate a contingency so denounced by Jackson as corrupt and dangerous—as an usurpation in the House which destroys the sovereignty of the people and nation in the highest and most important functions of that sovereignty, the selection of a Chief Magistrate of the Republic? Denounced, indeed, by the greatest, and wisest of their leaders, the fathers and founders of the party—by Jefferson, Jackson, Benton, Hayne, McDuffie, Van Buren, Polk, Buchanan, Richard M. Johnson, etc.—by the men who so often led them to victory under the inspiring enthusiasm created by their determined and uncompromising hostility to an election by the House of a President. Why, now, do they labor to reverse all this? Why, now, do they fill the land with seditious vaporings, threats, and plottings in the criminal effort to trample under their feet the teachings, principles, and gospel of the old prophets of Democratic reform?

Is not their purpose plain? Is it not to introduce into the House and Government that very corruption so dangerous to the sovereignty and liberties of the people, and as a means of consummating the end and aim of all their plotting—the seizure of the Government through organized violence and fraud?

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS.

It is important at this time to obtain from historic records an account of the proceedings adopted in the various States for the purpose of securing Presidential electors, and the grounds on which their selection was made. Of course it will be understood that the Presidential candidates were taken from the great political parties, and that the election would turn upon the fact that a majority of votes would indicate the choice of the people. The nearer we can go to the founders of the Republic to ascertain what they did in the matter the more certain we may be of the correctness of their action; and if we are willing to be guided by them the greater will be the satisfaction of the country. One thing, however, deserves remark upon the threshold, from its influence upon all their subsequent movements, and that is, the entire absence of doubt as to the propriety of what they were doing, and the reliance they had on the good faith of the men to be elected that they would carry into effect the wishes of the majority of the citizens who were to intrust them with power. The Republic could not have been established if the right of the majority to rule had not been recognized. And again, the honesty of a majority seems never to have been questioned in those early days, because it was felt that the patriotic love which distinguished all classes was too great and pure and loyal in its purpose to permit the unscrupulous politician to lead the masses into crooked ways in order to defeat the popular choice. The thing was never thought of, and therefore the arrangements made in a public meeting for the nomination of Presidential electors looked to the election of the right persons, with a view to obtain a result, humanly speaking, without the chance of disappointment or failure.

In illustration of this position, and to show how grandly true and loyal were the fathers of the Republic who voted for Madison as President, the following account is substantially taken from Niles' Weekly Register of February 29, 1812: It appears that the members of both branches of the General Assembly of Virginia met in the Capitol, in that month, to nominate suitable persons to be supported at the ensuing election as electors of a President and Vice President. The Speaker occupied the chair. There were twenty-five districts in the State; and on motion, and the question being taken on each of twenty-five names, a list is given of twenty-five persons who were recommended as electors for President and Vice President. Corresponding committees were also nominated, and a central corresponding committee in the city of Richmond was appointed, in which occur such names as William Wirt and Peyton Randolph, showing its character and influence. The reason is then given for all the care taken in the selection of the electors. It is very simple, but it nevertheless inspired them in the execution of their duty, and lay at the foundation of their hopes and labor.

It may be proper to say that but one sentiment reigned through the meeting, and that the only test laid down, whether they should or should not vote for such and such an elector, was whether he would or would not vote for James Madison as President of the United States.

Nothing can be clearer than this—that a person nominated for Presidential elector, if elected, has undertaken to perform a duty, the character of which he knew beforehand. He has no discretion; nor has any other person the power or the right to instruct him. A certificate of election from the proper officers under the law cannot legally be withheld from him or given to another. It is the evidence of his authority to act, and that he has been trusted by the people to cast his vote, on the assembling of the electoral college, for the Presidential candidate they named to him—a duty which he pledged himself to perform at the time of his nomination; and his election only gives him the opportunity of redeeming his pledge, by performing the duty in the way he was instructed. The people in the case cited in Virginia had no doubt of the elector's qualification when his name was accepted. His election, therefore, and his casting his vote in the direction indicated, or for the candidate the people desired to see elected, simply enabled him to confirm the confidence the people had in him as an upright and honorable citizen. This, too, is the case with every Republican Presidential elector. He cast his vote for Hayes and Wheeler, whom the majority had elected, as the country well knew. Had a majority of votes been cast for Tilden and Hendricks the country would have acquiesced; and however much the Republican party might have deplored the calamity it would have offered no opposition. There would have been no dishonest efforts to complicate the vote of the Presidential electors; no desire to buy off members of returning boards or votes in the electoral college, held by mean and weak Republicans waiting to be bribed. Republicans would have let the election go to Mr. Tilden, and have redoubled their diligence to lessen the evils of such an event. But Mr. Tilden was not elected. Mr. Tilden knows he was not elected. Mr. Hewitt and Mr. Randall and other Democratic blusterers know the same—that Mr. Tilden was overwhelmingly defeated at the polls, and is in a minority in the electoral college, which no bragging, no lying, no bribing can reverse in Mr. Tilden's favor. What, then, is at the bottom of the tactics of the Democratic party who want to snatch victory from the hands of the victorious Republicans? Tilden's defeat is the death-blow of the Democracy. The country did not know the depths of degradation to which the Democratic party had sunk until revealed by Tilden's defeat, so ignominious and so signal. ADDITION, DIVISION, and SILENCE was the Democratic gospel in the reign of Tweed and Tilden, those truly good men. Tweed vanished out of public gaze, and threw Tilden on his own resources. Left by himself he assumed control of the Democratic party, and, aspiring to the Presidency, added another chapter to the Democratic gospel of FRAUD and BLOODSHED and CORRUPTION, which, being applied to the events of the canvass, determined the people to reject Tilden, the corruptionist, and elect Hayes to the Chief Magistracy of the nation, because they believed in Republican honesty and truth.

THE SILVER CONTROVERSY IN EUROPE AND AMERICA.

IMPORTANT HISTORICAL FACTS ON THE DOUBLE AND SINGLE MONETARY STANDARDS.

LETTER FROM MINISTER WASHBURNE.

The American Minister to France, in December last, transmitted to the State Department at Washington an interesting summary of the views of the more prominent European minds on the decline in the value of silver, and also on the propriety of a double monetary standard. The following is the text of this important paper :

UNITED STATES LEGATION, PARIS.

SIR : The rapid and growing depreciation of silver, which had for some time attracted the attention of the principal economists and financial men of Europe, is now becoming a matter of serious uneasiness to the Governments that have the largest proportion of silver currency in the world. I mean America, France, Germany, and England, the last named for her Indian empire.

The question is of such vital importance, it threatens to assume such vast proportions, and is, in so many respects, connected with the measures at present under consideration in our country regarding the resumption of specie payments, that I have thought it would not be uninteresting to you to know how it is presented in Europe, and what solutions the most competent French economists propose for a crisis whose consequences might prove disastrous for the whole commercial world.

The European States may be divided into two classes with regard to metallic currency: those which have adopted gold alone for their monetary standard, and those which use both a gold and silver standard. The first are England, Germany, (the latter since the 1st of January only,) and Holland. It may be noticed, however, that while England recognizes no other legal standard than gold, her immense Indian empire has no other currency than silver. The second class comprises France, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland, and Greece. To these we should, temporarily at least, add Germany; for though the German Empire has begun to withdraw its various silver coins, and has decided by law that on and after the 1st of January of the present year the gold mark shall be the only legal tender, it has, nevertheless, authorized, for an indeterminate lapse of time, the circulation of thalers, Russia and Austria, which are both doomed to paper currency for a long time to come, need not be taken into consideration.

The bimetallic or double-standard system can evidently subsist but by the assumption of an unvariable ratio between the value of gold and that of silver. In France, that ratio was determined by a law of the year XI, (1803,) which is the basis of the French monetary system, and which established for the relative value of gold and silver the ratio of 1 to 15½. This means that to have in silver the equivalent of any given weight of gold, we must multiply that weight by 15½.

The French ratio was successively adopted by the six above-named States, and during a long time the value thus settled underwent very slight variations. When gold was discovered in California, it was believed in Europe that this metal would suffer a certain depreciation, and various measures were resorted to in order to avoid the impending danger. Holland even went so far as to declare that gold should no more be a legal tender, but after a short perturbation the relative value of the two metals was brought back to its former state, and the ratio of 15½ to 1 remained unchanged.

It was not until 1867 that this ratio began to experience variations detrimental to silver and favorable to gold. Eighteen hundred and sixty-seven was the year of the universal exhibition at Paris. On that occasion an international monetary conference was held there, the great object of which was the investigation of the means of establishing monetary unity. The conference, in which nearly all the civilized countries, the United States among others, were represented, and to which men eminently skilled in financial matters had been called, gave a large majority in favor of the adoption of gold as the sole monetary standard. From that moment the value of silver began to decline. At first the depreciation was very slow and hardly perceptible, but by degrees it went on accelerating. In 1872 it was as yet but 2 per cent.; in 1873 it had become 1 per cent. more. In the course of the latter year the French Government, in hopes of preventing, or at least restraining, the further depreciation of silver, determined to restrict the coining of that metal. This measure, which was contrary to the spirit if not to the letter of the law of the year XI, (for till then any denizen had a right to send to the mint for coining as much metal as he chose,) produced an effect quite the reverse of what was expected; the value of silver continued declining, and in 1874 its depreciation with regard to gold was 4 per cent.

At that time other events took place which seem also to have essentially contributed to the depreciation of silver.

Germany, whose metallic currency had, up to 1870, been almost entirely limited to silver, finding herself after the conclusion of peace possessed of an immense capital, resolved to unify her monetary system and adopt gold as the sole standard. She therefore ordered that none of the foreign coins, of which a great number were in free circulation throughout the Empire, should thereafter be a legal tender, called in the florins and other silver coins of Southern Germany and of the Hanseatic cities, decreed that on and after the 1st of January, 1876, the sole legal tender should be the gold mark, and coined gold pieces of ten and twenty marks, to the amount of 1,200,000,000. In order to complete this reformation, it would have been necessary to call in all the thalers then in circulation; but as their total amount is equal to 74,000,000 francs, and as the sudden withdrawal of so great a mass of metal presents difficulties of all kinds, Germany has decided to accomplish it gradually, and has therefore retained the thalers as a legal tender, assimilating them, however, to gold pieces of three marks, and adopting for their value with regard to gold the ratio of 1 to 15½, accepted by the bimetallic States, so that every thaler, now worth three marks, weighs 15½ times as much as the three-mark gold piece.

Therefore, though adopting as a principle the monometallic system, and declaring the thaler to be a provisional currency, which is retained, but not allowed to be increased, Germany belongs de facto to the class of bimetallic States, since the thaler, or silver mark, and the gold mark are, in that country, exchangeable at par. The consequences of such a state of things were not slow to appear. As the value of silver abroad was everywhere declining, while it suffered no depreciation at home, the German bankers exported German gold to meet their payments in foreign countries, and kept the German silver for their liabilities at home, so that the Government was obliged to buy and import its own gold, with which it paid for the silver called in, and then sell that same silver at a loss.

Such being the situation, all the bimetallic States had reason to fear that Germany might send to their mints the silver she withdrew from her own circulation, and which she could dispose of only at a heavy loss in London, the great mart of the precious metals of the world.

In fact, at that time, 1874, silver which was then, and still is, a legal tender in France, Belgium, Italy, and Switzerland, could be coined to any amount in those countries. There was no law to prevent a French, a Belgian, an Italian, or a Swiss citizen from carrying to the mint all the silver he could obtain; the coining of it could in no case be denied him. It would, therefore, have been an easy matter for Germany to have her florins and thalers, which could not be advantageously disposed of in England or the United States, converted into francs and lires, circulating at a par with gold. France hoped to avert this danger—if there was any danger in the case—by the formation of a monetary league, the object of which was to restrict the liberty of coining. This is what is known as the Latin Monetary Union. It was constituted in 1874 by a convention signed at Paris. These countries bound themselves not to produce during the year 1874 more than 120,000,000 of francs in silver coinage. Such an agreement was of reality nothing else than a step toward the adoption of gold as the sole standard, since the measure of precaution was against silver alone, while leaving the coinage of gold completely free.

The results of this measure, however, did not correspond to what its authors expected. The value of silver still declined, and at the end of 1874 it was 5 per cent. below par. In 1875 a second conference of the Latin Union fixed the limit of the coinage of silver in the four States at 150,000,000 francs for that year. Nevertheless the decline continued. It had reached 8 per cent. when the conference held its third meeting at the beginning of the present year. No other remedy was sought for than that which had been attempted so far, and the amount of silver coinage was still further reduced for 1876. France was allowed to make five-franc pieces only to the amount of 54,000,000 francs instead of 75,000,000 which had been authorized in 1875; Italy, 36,000,000 francs instead of 50,000,000; Belgium, 10,800,000 francs instead of 15,000,000; Switzerland, 7,200,000 francs instead of 10,000,000. Greece, which had recently joined the Union, was authorized to coin 15,600,000 francs, of which 8,400,000 francs were allowed in the place of the old silver specie withdrawn.

This determination had scarcely been adopted when silver suffered a new decline much more rapidly this time than previously. In the space of two months it lost 3 and even 4 per cent., so that the difference between the commercial and the legal value of the metal reached 12 and 13 per cent.

Such was the state of things when the new chambers of France met. One of the first acts of the new Minister of Finances was to present a bill empowering the Government to restrict the coinage of silver in so far as it might be deemed necessary, or, in other words, not to avail itself to the full extent of the right granted to France by the monetary convention. It must be observed, in fact, that while the convention established a maximum amount of coinage, it establishes no minimum, and that in 1874 and 1875 France coined the maximum allotted to her only because her laws did not allow her to do otherwise.

The object of the bill introduced by Mr. Léon Say is to alter this state of things; it was brought before the Senate on the 21st of this month, and gave rise to a long and interesting debate, in which Mr. De Parieu, a man eminent by his special knowledge of monetary matters, attacked the principle of the double standard vigorously, while Mr. Roland, governor of the Bank of France, with marked ability, defended it. The bill will certainly pass, but the question now is whether the new law will produce the result expected from it. When France has completely stopped coining silver, will the depreciation of this metal be prevented thereby, or even partially checked? It is, at least, doubtful.

On this highly important question two essentially distinct doctrines are entertained by the financial men and economists of Europe.

On one side stand the monometallists, or champions of gold as the sole monetary standard; on the other, the bimetallics, or supporters of the old system of the double standard. Among the former are Messrs. Louis Bamberger, of Berlin; Max Wirth, of Vienna; Frère Orban, of Brussels; Feer Herzog, of Berne, and in France, Michel Chevalier, De Parieu, Victor Bonnet, Frédéric Passy, and Leroy Beaulieu. Their principal organs are, in London, the Economist; in Paris, the Journal des Débats, and the Economiste.

On the other side are Messrs. Malon, Minister of Finances in Belgium; Laveley and Allard, of Brussels; Count Sclopis, of Turin; Léon Say, Magne, Wolowsky, André Courcelle-Seneuil, and Henri Cernuschi, of France. The principal organs of this group are the Siècle, and the République Française.

The theory of the monometallists may be summed up as follows: The first cause of the perturbation now prevailing in the monetary market is the superabundant production of silver. The mines of the New World, by pouring in upon us tons of this metal at the very time when the coinage of silver is restricted in almost every country, have produced such a difference between its value and that of gold that the balance is irretrievably destroyed. Every attempt, moreover, to maintain a constant ratio between the values of the two metals, both of which are subject to so many causes of variation, must always prove utterly useless. There exists but one remedy of real efficacy for the state of things created by the bimetallic system. We must completely abandon that system and adopt gold as our sole monetary standard. On that condition only we shall be able to extricate ourselves from the dangers and difficulties of two metallic standards legally exchangeable at par, though one of them is much more abundant than the other, and at the same time very bulky.

To these arguments, which the very able economist of the Journal des Débats, Mr. Leroy Beaulieu, advances with great force, and which M. de Parieu presented in the Senate with all the authority of his long experience in financial matters, the bimetallics oppose the following answer:

It is not the superabundant production of silver that has caused the perturbation; it is the limitation of the coinage of silver, a measure almost equivalent to total suppression, and the withdrawal of a great part of the silver coin already existing. Silver having lost the principal use to which it has always been applied, remains partly unemployed, and its depreciation increases as the demand for it goes on decreasing. The total adoption of the monometallic system, far from improving the present state of things, would do nothing but aggravate it, and infallibly result in a fearful financial catastrophe. To extricate ourselves from these difficulties, we should, on the contrary, hasten to retrace our steps and restore silver to its destination, by repealing all measures restricting its coinage. So soon as the great Powers, resuming the bimetallic system fully, shall decree that the coinage of gold and silver is unlimited, and that the two metals shall always be exchangeable at a rate established once for all—that of 15½ for 1, for instance, which is already generally accepted—there will be no more fluctuations in the relative value of gold and silver. As the two metals will constitute but one monetary mass, the greater or less quantity produced by the mines of either of them can then affect only the total mass. The purchasing power of this mass may increase or diminish, according to its greater or less abundance, but gold and silver, whatever may be the quantity of either, will retain their relative value, since the one will always be the representative of the other. ●

This theory is certainly very attractive, and it has found in Mr. Henri Cernuschi a most ardent, indefatigable, and ever-ready advocate. In the daily notes, which he published in the Siècle, as well as in a multitude of pamphlets that are immediately translated into English and German, this bold and original economist defends the double-metallic standard by arguments which I cannot undertake to reproduce in this summary, but which certainly deserve the serious attention of all who take an interest in the question.

Among the considerations invoked by the bimetallists two are certainly of special importance. The first is that every measure restricting the coinage of silver has immediately been followed by a decline of the metal. The fact is undeniable; but it may be a mere coincidence, and not a consequence. It is possible that silver would have declined even if its coinage had not been restricted. The bimetallists here merely invert the argument of the monometallists, who say that the coinage was restricted for the very reason of the decline of silver. The second consideration bears on the enormous perturbations that would infallibly follow the general application of the monometallic system. In order to accomplish it, it would in fact be necessary to withdraw from circulation an enormous quantity of metal. What, for example, would be the amount of it for France, Germany, and British India alone?

In France, from 1795 to 1871, inclusive, silver has been coined to the value of 5,122,000,000 francs. Of these, 236,000,000 have been withdrawn by Government, and it is estimated that of the balance only 1,200,000,000 to 1,500,000,000 in five-franc pieces still exist in France, of which 495,000,000 are at present in the vaults of the bank. Suppose 400,000,000 be kept for small payments and as change, 800,000,000 to 1,100,000,000 will be left for withdrawal.

In Germany, according to official statements published in Berlin, the total amount of the silver coined by the different German States before 1871 was £68,000,000 sterling. The silver still circulating amounts to £21,000,000; thus leaving a balance of £47,000,000. Suppose about £17,000,000 to have disappeared by exportation or melting, there would remain £30,000,000 sterling, or 750,000,000 francs, to be withdrawn.

For India we have no statistics. It is generally supposed that the circulation of that country amounts to £150,000,000, which is not at all extraordinary when we consider that the population of India is seven times that of Great Britain, and that gold coin is unknown in the country. In India alone the sum to be withdrawn would, therefore, be as much as 1,500,000,000 or 2,000,000,000 of francs, so that the total amount to be called in would be at least 3,500,000,000 of francs; that is, $700,000,000 rendered useless as a currency, and of which the Government would have to dispose at an enormous discount. The bare mention of these figures is sufficient to give an idea of the crisis that would take place in the whole world as a consequence of so gigantic an operation as that recommended by the monometallists.

I shall not undertake to discuss and still less to propose a solution for the great monetary problem now impending over the world. I hope, however, that this summary of the question, perhaps too long extended, may be of some utility in helping you to a clearer understanding of the manner in which it is viewed in France.

I have, &c.,

E. B. WASHBURNE.

Hon. Hamilton Fish.

HAD ENOUGH OF IT.—The people of the South have had all the war they want, for a century at least. They are not inclined to invite desolation by offering themselves as willing sacrifices to Mr. Tilden's ambition. Another war would be no holiday affair to the South. The black man would prove a more unwelcome citizen with a musket in his hand, than he is now regarded with the ballot. Now, he may hurt his white neighbor's feelings, but with a war on hand he would be apt to hurt something else. For this reason the South prefers peace to war, and neither Mr. Tilden nor his bad advisers can induce it to fall into line for a new revolution, which, while it might bring untold disasters upon the North, would bring annihilation upon the South. Hayes and peace is the watchword of the hour.

A TOUCHING PICTURE.—Democratic leaders, cracking champagne bottles, and under the influence of Tilden's wine and boned turkey, clamoring for war because of oppression and hard times, is one of those touching pictures of human suffering that are calculated to bring tears to the eyes of a cast-iron statue.

WADE HAMPTON'S CLAIMS.

Wade Hampton has never ceased to call the people of South Carolina to witness that he would be their next Governor. He said so from the first announcement of his candidacy to the close of the polls. He said so when the counting of the ballots proclaimed his defeat, and every honest man in the State knew that the majority of the citizens did not want him, and had determined not to have him. In all this Wade Hampton was but playing a part in a conspiracy plotted by rebel Democrats, into which he naturally fell, being a rebel Democrat himself. The great curse of the South at this moment is the rebel Democracy. They have not only done their best to prevent the restoration of peace and order, but have really combined together for the purpose of securing representation of rebel citizenship. In South Carolina Wade Hampton did not appeal to the people to support him for the office of Governor; he knew too well that such an appeal would have been made in vain. Nothing is more repulsive to Southern Republicans, and to those truer Democrats who have accepted the situation, and in whose heart the love of country has triumphed over the passions of the past, than the persistent crowding of unreconstructed rebels into prominence. These men ask to be sent to Congress or elected to office because they are rebels. Wade Hampton stoutly maintains that he is a rebel, and on that ground asks to be rewarded with the governorship. This rebel plea for reward is not intended to be, and cannot be, addressed to the people; and the reason of its being put forward was to fire the Southern heart and lead to demonstrations of rebel strength, for the purpose of intimidation and bloodshed. So certain was Wade Hampton that what he calls South Carolina would respond to his invitation by doing just what they did, that he calculated upon an inauguration as Governor in the presence of the rifle clubs and all that class of Kuklux assassins, whose only claim to notice springs from habitual violation of law and habitual practice of bloodshed. These were the noble sons of South Carolina who were to redeem the State. Wade Hampton sighed to be their Governor. It was of no consequence to him that he was not elected. At the head of such banditti, he would soon have reduced the people to submission without consulting their wishes. He had great faith in rifle clubs. While Columbia, South Carolina, was swarming with such ruffians, and train after train bringing them there, Wade Hampton telegraphed the President to withdraw the troops and he would guarantee peace. The President took in the situation at a glance. He would not withdraw the troops; "for," said General Grant, "peace there is the peace of death." So the troops remained, and Chamberlain was inaugurated, as he had been elected, while Wade Hampton, chafing at being restrained from having a grand battue of Republicans and drenching the streets of the State capital with blood, counted the hours until the day came when he, too, was to be inaugurated, because he wanted the office, and there were rebel Democrats foolish enough to go through the ceremony, and an audience of red-shirted rebels to look upon the farce.

But Wade Hampton had made calculations for a different termination. As a rebel, he meant to redeem the State in the interest of rebels. How he would have reveled in disloyalty; with what intense hatred he would have scorned the Administration, had the President been weak enough to leave the State at Wade Hampton's mercy, to inaugurate a reign of terror and murder. In such times as the present the hand of the rebel is kept from putting the muzzle of a revolver or a rifle to the head of a Republican citizen by the presence of Federal troops, and however much the necessity for the troops may be deplored, their presence certainly afforded leisure to the State poets who desired to indulge in strains of rebel pathos or of praise. This is learned by the issue of an "extra" of the Columbia Daily Register, on the afternoon of December 17, 1876. The size of the paper is not much larger than a lady's visiting card, and the contents consist of two poems, the first of which is entitled, "D. H. Chamberlain's Farewell Address"—a very clear indication that it was the intention of "Gov." Wade Hampton to drive him out of the State. It says :

" I am sitting on the train to-night,
With carpet-bag by my side,
Which I with plunder well have filled
Since the 'Sunny South' I tried.

* * * * *
" The State I ruled is now redeemed,
The people at me scoff,
And, having taken all things else,
Myself I'll now take off."

These are the first and last verses of the "effusion." They are neither elegant nor poetic, but what can be expected from a rebel poet, who is celebrating the enforced exit of a Governor elected by the people, as Governor Chamberlain was, at the hands of a rebel like Wade Hampton, who wanted to be Governor, but who found out when too late that the people did not want him? Nevertheless, "The Answer of the People of South Carolina" to the departing Governor's rhymes is said to be the substance of the second poem, which limps along in this wise :

" TO DANIEL H. CHAMBERLAIN.

" Go, traitor, go ! Thy broken trust
Is monumental crime ;
We spare thy life, for God is just,
And we will bide His time.

" The legislative bayonets gleam
Above our broken laws ;
Thy country's Constitution pierced
To stab the people's cause.

" Though we have quaffed the bitter cup
Held by thy stranger hand,
The law inviolate we keep,
And spurn thee from the land.

* * * * *
" Here, where you sowed the seeds of strife,
Two races blessed shall stand ;
Their rights inviolate maintained,
While justice rules the land.

" The law supreme in peace shall sway
The soldier and his sword ;
And all shall bless the happy day
That trusted Hampton's word."

The President, however, would not believe a word of Hampton's peaceable intentions. This he said, too, while the rhyming rodomontade was being written. No ; Hampton did not believe the stuff himself, as he carried revolvers in his pocket, like every true son of the South. And the assertion is ventured that not a man believes a word of it, North or South. Yet the publication of this insignificant "extra" of the Daily Register made a sensation. Hundreds of "riflemen" and pedestrians stood on the curbstone and in the road, publicly reading it, wondering at Hampton's shrewdness, and thinking that he must capture the intelligence of the country. What a country that must be to be captured by such stuff ! And what a cause that has to be supported by such falsehood and impudent disloyalty on behalf of a man who has not common sense enough to know the value of truth and honor !

Will not the Democratic House committee tell him that the people are sick of his efforts to keep up rebellion and bad feeling between the North and the South ; or, as Democrats, do the members of the committee approve his action on behalf of Mr. Tilden ? Are they, too, busy in searching for votes to elect Mr. Tilden to the Presidency, in order that Mr. Wade Hampton's merits as a rebel may receive a greater measure of reward ? Be it what it may, their labor will be lost. The honest sentiment of the country is crystallizing upon the election of Mr. Hayes and the fact that he will be inaugurated. Southern rebels won't fight, and Northern Democrats, who deceived the South into rebellion once, are not known much for feats of arms. Mr. Speaker Randall would look well, doubtless, carrying a musket in another rebellion, but he deals more with words than with the intention of committing the overt act ; and there's danger for him and his Democratic friends if the step were taken. Moreover, he and they and the Democratic party may as well understand first as last that the best men in the country are in no mood to be trifled with. A people may be made angry by reckless assertion and treasonous boasting. The people are quiet now and determined. Woe to the Democratic leaders who dare to bring on a conflict by the ill-timed use of words ! It will be better for them if they had not been born !

THE RETURNING BOARD OF LOUISIANA.

The returning board of Louisiana, under the laws of the State, was clothed with the power of rejecting such parishes as were controlled by violence or fraud. The only question to be determined is, did the board reject any votes without good reason for so doing? To answer this question correctly we must examine the evidence upon which the board acted. This evidence shows a condition of affairs in certain parishes disgraceful to the nation, and a blot upon our civilization. We have but to apply the same method of securing majorities to Northern communities to fully understand the situation in Louisiana. Imagine a county or a congressional district so controlled by the rifle policy that a Republican was continually in danger of his life because of his opinion's sake. Imagine armed bands of Democrats riding around, both day and night, threatening, whipping, killing Republicans, in order to prevent them from voting. Imagine the roads leading to the polling-places picketed with armed ruffians to prevent Republicans from going to the polls, and an armed mob in possession of the ballot boxes, killing on sight any one who dared to differ from them, and a fair picture may be had of certain parishes in Louisiana, whose votes were rejected by the returning board in accordance with duty and law. Does any one believe that such a district in the North could have its vote counted? We venture to say that no intelligent Democrat can be found in any of the Northern States who would justify the counting of votes cast under a system that crushes the opposition by violence and intimidation. The following is but a sample of the cases before the returning board. Some of them are sickening in their details, and unfit for publication. The recital of these outrages perpetrated in the interest of the Democratic party is simply horrible, and should bring the blush of shame to the faces of all who are in any way responsible for this deplorable state of affairs :

"Ellen J. Dunham, being duly sworn, says : I live in the tenth ward, in the parish of East Baton Rouge. On the night of the 12th of April, 1876, I was at the house of my mother, in company with my husband; at about 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning we heard a noise in front of the house; my father, Jerry Myers, went out to see what it was; I heard some one say to him, 'Halt, you damned old Radical nigger.' My brother, Sam Myers, jumped out of bed and said it was the bull-dozer; my husband jumped out of bed and ran out the back door, and I did not see him again until an hour after the sun was up. My brother ran out the front door and toward the woods. The bull-dozer, who were ten or twelve in number, began shooting at my brother; he ran about one hundred yards from the door and fell down dead, and when I saw him after he was carried into the house he was filled with bullet-holes. While the bull-dozer were looking at my brother running my father hid himself in an old potato-house, and when they turned around again they hallooed, 'Hunt the damned Radical nigger;' four or five came into the house. When mother and I were crying, they told us to shut our damn mouths and get the guns and pistols belonging to my father and brother; they found a pistol and an old musket, and said they wanted my mother to find them another shot-gun, but mother told them she did not know anything about it. They by this time found my father and dragged him out, and hallooed, 'Get a rope, boys, we have got the damned old son of a b—h,' and said to father, 'You got away from us once before, but we will fix you this time.' My mother and I began to scream and halloo; the bull-dozer told us to take a last look at the old man, as all you can do is to pray. The bull-dozer then took my father about a mile from the house and hung him to a tree on the side of the road. I think I recognized the voices of some of the bull-dozer, although they had their faces blackened, striped, and covered with handkerchiefs. I think one of the bull-dozer was Henry Kew; I think two of the other men were the Watts men. My father, brother, and husband were all Republicans, and would not join any Democratic club, and I think that was the reason they came to our house and killed my brother and father."

STAY HOME, GENTLEMEN.—If one hundred thousand "unarmed" conspirators march into Washington for the purpose of bull-dozing the Senate, it is safe to say that some of them will be "unlegged" before they leave. Stay home, gentlemen. What Watterson's tongue cannot do your unarmed or armed legions cannot accomplish.

A LEAF FROM THE RECORDS.

The old, musty records of the early history of the Republic are interesting reading in these times of Democratic assumption. From the Senate Journal, of April 6th, 1789, we clip the following. It sheds light on the vexed question of counting the electoral vote. As the vote referred to was counted in the presence of many persons who had assisted in framing the Constitution, this extract from the Journal comes to us with the force of Holy Writ :

"The Senate proceeded by ballot to the choice of a President for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States.

"John Langdon, Esq., was elected.

"Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed ; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice President of the United States ; and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed in the presence of the House to discharge that duty ; and that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared ; submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose."

On the same day Mr. Ellsworth subsequently reported that he had delivered the message. Then

"Mr. Boudinot, from the House of Representatives, communicated the following verbal message to the Senate :

"Mr. President : I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that the House is ready forthwith to meet the Senate to attend the opening and counting of the votes of the electors of the President and Vice President of the United States.

"And he withdrew."

That sheds no light on the subject.

"The Speaker and the House of Representatives attended in the Senate Chamber for the purpose expressed in the message delivered by Mr. Ellsworth ; and after some time withdrew.

"The Senate then proceeded by ballot to the choice of a President of their body pro tempore. John Langdon, Esq., was duly elected.

"The President elected for the purpose of counting the votes declared to the Senate that the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice President of the United States, which were as follows."

On this subject, and referring to the extract above quoted, Mr. Burchard of Illinois said :

"Now, if there is any doubt as to this action, whether the members of the First Congress, or the Second, or Third, or Fourth Congresses rightly understood the intention of the framers of the Constitution, that doubt is removed when we find that there were members of the constitutional convention which framed the very Constitution under which we are acting, who were members of the Senate and House of Representatives at the time when these votes were first counted. In the First Congress there were fifteen members of the constitutional convention who as members of the Senate or House were present at the time when the electoral votes were first counted, namely : In the Senate, John Langdon, William S. Johnson, Oliver Ellsworth, William Patterson, Robert Morris, George Read, Richard Basset, Pierce Butler and William Few. In the House, Nicholas Gilman, Roger Sherman, George Clymer, Daniel Carroll, James Madison, Jr., and Abraham Baldwin. Nearly all of them were present at the counting of the electoral votes, and tacitly assented to the proceedings and count.

"In the Second Congress there were twelve members of that constitutional convention present, and in the Third and Fourth six members of that constitutional convention. Will gentlemen of the present day say that the men who helped frame the Constitution of the United States, the very men most prominent in that constitutional convention, did not understand what the Constitution meant and did not know what they intended in adopting its provisions? Would they not have risen in their places and protested with all the vehemence they could that the count was not being conducted in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution? It seems to me the conclusion is irresistible that the manner in which this count was then conducted under the resolution of the constitutional convention and under the resolutions of Congress immediately afterward, is the extent of the power that it was deemed, by the members of the convention itself and by the first Congresses after the adoption of the Constitution, this House had the right to exercise."

THE RIGHT TO OPEN AND COUNT.

The following extract from the able speech delivered in the House of Representatives January 18th, by Burchard, of Illinois, will be read with interest. It clearly establishes the right of the Vice President to open and count the electoral vote. In fact, the early precedents of the Republic are so clear upon this now disputed point that we wonder that any one can be found to doubt the right at the present time. Mr. Burchard said :

"It cannot be claimed that because in the first meeting of Congress under the Constitution, and subsequently until the present time, tellers have been appointed, therefore Congress took control of the count. What is the duty of a teller? It is merely the ministerial duty of enumerating. In this House no teller has power to say what vote shall be counted. That power never has been exercised by a teller. If it is believed that a person not authorized to vote is passing between the tellers, the question is submitted to the presiding officer or the person having charge of the count, and there is no appeal from his decision, which is final and peremptory, subject merely to the right of the bodies, after he has disposed of the question, to act upon and criticise, and, if they deem proper, to censure the officer who makes that decision.

"But until the count is concluded and the declaration of the count made, the tellers have no authority to stop the proceedings or to interfere with the count. All that the two Houses authorized to be done was that the tellers should be appointed, who should sit at the Clerk's desk and make lists of the votes as they are declared.

"But there is another remarkable circumstance. The committee to devise a method for notifying the President as to the result of the count, and to certify to him his election, prepared a form. There were three members of the constitutional convention who were members of the committee which drafted that form of notification, namely, Mr. Patterson, Mr. Johnson, and Mr. Ellsworth. They devised a form which was signed by John Langdon, the President appointed under the resolution to count the vote, in which he certified that he had opened the certificates and counted the votes. Congress directed him to certify that he had opened the certificates and counted the votes, and he did make such a certificate and signed it. John Langdon, who had been a member of the constitutional convention himself, certified that he had opened the certificates and counted the votes. The form of the certificate, carefully prepared by the committee and reported as a form, was passed upon by the Senate and approved and entered upon the Journal, as follows :

"Be it known, that the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, being convened in the city and State of New York, the sixth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, the undersigned, appointed President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes of the electors, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and for a Vice President; by which it appears that George Washington, Esquire, was unanimously elected, agreeably to the Constitution, to the office of President of the United States of America.

"In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal. "JOHN LANGDON."

DECLINE IN BRITISH FOREIGN TRADE.

—"The official returns of the British Board of Trade of the commerce of Great Britain for the first seven months of the year 1876 shows an adverse balance of £102,453,000 against that country, the imports being £217,767,000 and the exports £115,294,000. The London Times observes that "except Spain and Brazil every customer we have is buying less hardware, and the demand for pig iron is lower than it was everywhere except in Holland, Belgium, and France; the export of railway iron has ceased altogether to Turkey, and has dwindled into insignificance for Holland, Belgium, Egypt, France, the United States, Peru, and Chili; it is also fast falling away for Russia and much lower for Australia." The Times goes on to say that the British trade with the United States is dwindling in almost every article of any importance. Commenting on this the Philadelphia North American believes that there are two reasons why the import trade with Great Britain is diminishing. The country, it thinks, has been much less able to purchase either at home or abroad since the steady and resistanceless contraction of credits and prices has told heavily upon business of all kinds, and the domestic interests have suffered equally with the foreign. Nevertheless it thinks there must be some foundation for the general belief that very much of this decline in the British exports to the United States is attributable to the amazing progress of American industrial interests and to their success against British competition.

THE TRUE REMEDY.

Under Governor Dix there were a few thousand idle laborers in the State of New York. The panic of 1873 had brought about a partial stagnation in business. Democratic demagogues seized upon the prevailing hard times as a good hobby to ride into power again. They went before the people with the cry of "elect Tilden and he will banish hard times." Their promises were golden. There should be no idle men. Everybody was to be employed at high wages; poverty was to be banished by a single wave of the Democratic wand. Enough dupes were found to believe this silly talk, and Tilden was elected Governor; but hard times continued. Instead of growing better, they grew worse. In vain have the workingmen appealed to the politicians whom they elevated into power to help them. They turn the hungry crowd away with empty promises, and have done this so often that hope has given place to despair, and starvation or beggary are the alternatives of tens of thousands who cast their vote for the Democratic ticket because they thought the success of democracy would be the dawn of prosperity to them.

The city of New York is the great stronghold of democracy. Its foreign element and the elements of ignorance and vice are so strongly intrenched that nothing but a political millennium will ever bring about a change. Deeper and deeper it is plunged into debt, until now the interest on its indebtedness bears upon its prosperity like a hideous nightmare upon the sleeping dyspeptic. In vain the tax-payer grumbles and growls. In vain they combine to throw off the load. The heavy load of corrupt officials bears them down each month and year, sucking the life-blood of the city, until the victim can stand no more, and bankruptcy brings all to a common level. John Kelly, the boss of Tammany, with his $10,000 a year; Morrissey with his dazzling diamonds; Tilden in receipt of his millions, and wining and dining his chief wire-pullers in his palatial mansion, while the dupes who have given power to these political princes starve in their fireless homes or toil from morning till night for eighty cents a day, and most of this in store orders on which some rich Democratic contractor is making fifty per cent. profit, may be a pleasing sight to those who, having got the poor man's vote, care nothing for his soul or body, but to the thoughtful citizen it is a sight that brings regret and pain—pain to see the sufferings of the poor close to the groaning tables of those who have plundered them, and regret that human nature is so weak, and political prejudice so strong, as to keep these wretched men self-chained to the car that for years has been dragging them along the road of human misery.

Is it not about time for the workingmen of America to divorce themselves from the Democratic party, and come out boldly for the party of improvements and national progress? The Republican party makes no empty promises. Its past record shows that under its control both State and nation have prospered in a marvelous degree. Not until the democracy divided its power by false charges and empty promises, did the shadow of dull times encroach upon the fields of industry. As democracy grew in strength, our industries fell off, until now in the midst of an uncertainty, or rather in the presence of a fear, that it might by some accident or trick come into power, hundreds of thousands are idle and breadless, while a fatal paralysis seems to have seized upon every branch of trade and commerce.

What is the remedy? It is as simple as it will prove effective. It is to be found in the peaceful inauguration of Mr. Hayes, and in the crushing out by the force of public opinion of those public enemies who are preaching armed resistance to the constituted authorities of the land. Under President Hayes the nation will again go forward; internal improvements will be pushed with zeal; industry will revive; capital will come out of its hiding places, and old-timed prosperity will again bless our land. Let the workingmen throw off the yoke of democracy; cast down the idol which they have prayed to in vain, and with renewed faith in the Republic, put their trust in the party which broke the chains of the slave and which to-day stands as the best friend of labor that the world ever saw.

COUNTING OF THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

THE REPORT AND BILL OF THE JOINT CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE.

In the Senate, Thursday, January 18th, Mr. Edmunds said:

"I am directed, Mr. President, by the select committee raised under the resolution of the Senate on the subject of the counting of the electoral votes, to submit a report in writing, with an accompanying bill. The report is signed, I am happy to say, with great unanimity by the members of both committees, it being a report in form, joint and several, to the two houses. It is signed by all with one exception."

THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEES.

The committees of the Senate and House of Representatives appointed under the following several resolutions—

HOUSE RESOLUTION.

Whereas there are differences of opinion as to the proper mode of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice President, and as to the manner of determining questions that may arise as to the legality and validity of returns made of such votes by the several States;

And whereas it is of the utmost importance that all differences of opinion and all doubt and uncertainty upon these questions should be removed, to the end therefore that the votes may be counted and the result declared by a tribunal whose authority none can question and whose decision all will accept as final; Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of seven members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, to act in conjunction with any similar committee that may be appointed by the Senate, to prepare and report without delay such a measure, either legislative or constitutional, as may, in their judgment, be best calculated to accomplish the desired end, and that said committee have leave to report at any time.

SENATE RESOLUTION.

Resolved, That the message of the House of Representatives on the subject of the Presidential election be referred to a select committee of seven Senators, with power to prepare and report, without unnecessary delay, such a measure, either of a legislative or other character, as may, in their judgment, be best calculated to accomplish the lawful counting of the electoral votes, and best disposition of all questions connected therewith, and the due declaration of the result; and that said committee have power to confer and act with the committee of the House of Representatives named in said message, and to report by bill or otherwise—

Beg leave to report to their respective houses that they have considered the subject named in said resolutions, and have had full and free conference with each other thereon, and now report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage. The substance of the bill embraces—

First. Provisions for the meeting of the two houses, as required by the Constitution, and the general course of proceeding, and the declaration of the result.

Second. Provisions for the disposition of questions arising in respect of States from which only one set of certificates has been received; that each house shall consider the question and shall only decide against a vote by concurrent, affirmative action.

Third. Provisions for so-called double returns from a State; that such conflicting returns and papers shall be submitted to the consideration of a commission, composed of equal numbers of members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives and of the Supreme Court of the United States; that this commission shall be organized and sworn and have power to consider and decide, according to the Constitution and law, what is the constitutional vote of the State in question: and that such decision shall govern the disposition of the subject, unless both houses shall determine otherwise.

Fourth. It is provided that the act shall not affect either way the question of the right of resort to the judicial courts of the United States by the persons concerned as claimants to the offices in question.

We have applied the utmost practicable study and deliberation to the subject, and believe that the bill now reported is the best attainable disposition of the difficult problems and disputed theories arising out of the late election. It must be obvious to every person conversant with the history of the country and with the formation and interpretation of the Constitution that a wide diversity of views and opinions touching the subject, not wholly coincident with the bias or wishes of the members of political parties, would naturally exist. We have in this state of things chosen, therefore, not to deal with abstract questions, save so far as they are necessarily involved in the legislation proposed. It is, of course, plain that the report of the bill implies that in our opinion legislation may be had on the subject in accordance with the Constitution, but we think that the law proposed is inconsistent with few of the principal theories upon the subject. The Constitution requires that the electoral votes shall be counted on a particular occasion. All will agree that the votes named in the Constitution are the constitutional votes of the States, and not other; and when they have been found and identified, there is nothing left to be disputed or decided; all the rest is the mere clerical work of summing up the numbers, which being done, the Constitution itself declares the consequence.

This bill, then, is only directed to ascertaining, for the purpose and in aid of the counting, what are the constitutional votes of the respective States; and, whatever jurisdiction exists for such purpose, the bill only regulates the method of exercising it. The Constitution, our great instrument and security for liberty and order, speaks in the amplest language for all such cases, in whatever aspect they may be presented. It declares that the Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof." The committee therefore think that the law proposed cannot be justly assailed as unconstitutional by any one, and for this reason we think it unnecessary, whatever may be our individual views, to discuss any of the theories referred to. Our fidelity to the Constitution is observed when we find that the law we recommend is consistent with that instrument.

The matter then being a proper subject for legislation, the fitness of the means proposed becomes the next subject for consideration. Upon this we beg leave to submit a few brief observations.

In all just governments both public and private rights must be defined and determined by the law. This is essential to the very idea of such a government, and is the characteristic distinction between free and despotic systems. However important it may be, whether one citizen or another shall be the Chief Magistrate for a prescribed period, upon just theories of civil institutions, it is of far greater moment that the will of the people, lawfully expressed in the choice of that officer, shall be ascertained and carried into effect in a lawful way. It is true that in every operation of a government of laws, from the most trivial to the most important, there will always be the possibility that the result reached will not be the true one. The Executive officer may not wisely perform his duty, the courts may not truly declare the law, and the legislative body may not enact the best laws; but, in either case, to resist the act of the Executive, the courts, or the Legislature, acting constitutionally and lawfully within their sphere, would be to set up anarchy in the place of government. We think, then, that to provide a clear and lawful means of performing a great and necessary function of government, in a time of much public dispute, is of far greater importance than the particular advantage that any man or party may in the course of events possibly obtain. But we have still endeavored to provide such lawful agencies of decision in the present case as shall be the most fair and impartial possible under the circumstances. Each of the branches of the Legislature and the judiciary is represented in the tribunal in equal proportions. The composition of the judicial part of the commission looks to a selection from different parts of the Republic, while it is thought to be free from any preponderance of supposable bias; and the addition of the necessary constituent part of the whole commission, in order to obtain an uneven number, is left to an agency the farthest removed from prejudice or any existing attainable one. It would be difficult, if not impossible, we think, to establish a tribunal that could be less the subject of party criticism than such a one. The principle of its constitution is so absolutely fair that we are unable to perceive how the most extreme partisan can assail it, unless he prefers to embark his wishes upon the stormy sea of unregulated procedure, hot disputes, and dangerous results, that can neither be measured nor defined, rather than upon the fixed and regular course of law, that insures peace and the order of society, whatever party may be disappointed in its hopes.

The unfortunate circumstance that no provision had been made on the subject before the election has greatly added to the difficulties of the committees in dealing with it, inasmuch as many of the people of the country, members of the respective political parties, will perhaps look with jealousy upon any measure that seems to involve even the possibility of the defeat of their wishes; but it has also led the committees to feel that their members are bound by the highest duty, in such a case, to let no bias of party feeling stand in the way of a just, equal, and peaceful measure for extricating the question from the embarrassments that at present surround it.

In conclusion, we respectfully beg leave to impress upon Congress the necessity of a speedy determination upon this subject. It is impossible to estimate the material loss that the country daily sustains from the existing state of uncertainty. It directly and powerfully tends to unsettle and paralyze business, to weaken public and private credit, and to create apprehensions in the minds of the people that disturb the peaceful tenor of their ways and mar their happiness. It does far more: it tends to bring republican institutions into discredit, and to create doubts of the success of our form of government, and of the perpetuity of the Republic. All considerations of interest, of patriotism, and of justice unite in demanding of the law-making power a measure that will bring peace and prosperity to the country, and show that our republican institutions are equal to any emergency. And in this connection we cannot refrain from the expression of our satisfaction that your committees, composed of equal numbers of opposing parties, have fortunately been able to do what has been attempted in vain heretofore, almost unanimously agree upon a plan considered by them all to be just, wise, and efficient. We accordingly recommend the proposed act to the patriotic and just judgment of Congress.

THE BILL TO PROVIDE FOR AND REGULATE THE COUNTING OF THE VOTES.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Senate and House of Representatives shall meet in the hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock P. M. on the first Thursday in February, A. D. 1877; and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer. Two tellers shall be previously appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, all the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes, which certificates and papers shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A; and said tellers, having then read the same in the presence and hearing of the two houses, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been ascertained and counted as in this act provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote, and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two houses. Upon such reading of any such certificates or paper when there shall be only one return from a State, the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one Member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all objections so made to any vote or paper from a State shall have been received and read, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and such objections shall be submitted to the Senate for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, submit such objections to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been received shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two houses. When the two houses have voted, they shall immediately again meet, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted.

SEC. 2. That if more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State shall have been received by the President of the Senate, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice President in such State, (unless they shall be duplicates of the same return,) all such returns and papers shall be opened by him in the presence of the two houses when met as aforesaid and read by the tellers, and all such returns and papers shall thereupon be submitted to the judgment and decision, as to which is the true and lawful electoral vote of such State, of a commission constituted as follows, namely:

During the session of each house on the Tuesday next preceding the first Thursday in February, 1877, each house shall, by viva voce vote, appoint five of its members, who, with the five Associate Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, to be ascertained as hereinafter provided, shall constitute a commission for the decision of all questions upon or in respect of such double returns named in this section.

On the Tuesday next preceding the first Thursday in February, A. D. 1877, or as soon thereafter as may be, the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States now assigned to the first, third, eighth and ninth circuits shall select, in such manner as a majority of them shall deem fit, another of the Associate Justices of said court, which five persons shall be members of said commission; and the person longest in commission of said five justices shall be the president of said commission. The members of said commission shall respectively take and subscribe the following oath:

"I, ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will impartially examine and consider all questions submitted to the commission of which I am a member, and a true judgment give thereon, agreeably to the Constitution and the laws; so help me God;" which oath shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate.

When the commission shall have been thus organized, it shall not be in the power of either house to dissolve the same or to withdraw any of its members; but if any such Senator or Member shall die or become physically unable to perform the duties required by this act, the fact of such death or physical inability shall be by said commission, before it shall proceed further, communicated to the Senate or House of Representatives, as the case may be, which body shall immediately and without debate proceed by viva voce vote to fill the place so vacated, and the person so appointed shall take and subscribe the oath hereinbefore prescribed, and become a member of said commission; and, in like manner, if any of said justices of the Supreme Court shall die or become physically incapable of performing the duties required by this act, the other of said justices, members of the said commission, shall immediately appoint another justice of said court a member of said commission; and, in such appointments, regard shall be had to the impartiality and freedom from bias sought by the original appointments to said commission, who shall thereupon immediately take and subscribe the oath hereinbefore prescribed, and become a member of said commission to fill the vacancy so occasioned.

All the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of each State shall be opened, in the alphabetical order of the States, as provided in section 1 of this act; and when there shall be no more than one such certificate or paper, as the certificates and papers from such State shall so be opened, (excepting duplicates of the same return,) they shall be read by the tellers, and thereupon the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two houses acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, and shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration; which decision shall be made in writing, stating briefly the ground thereof, and signed by the members of said commission agreeing therein; whereupon the two houses shall again meet, and such decision shall be read and entered in the Journal of each house, and the counting of the votes shall proceed in conformity therewith, unless, upon objection made thereto in writing by at least five Senators and five members of the House of Representatives, the two houses shall separately concur in ordering otherwise; in which case such concurrent order shall govern. No votes or papers from any other State shall be acted upon until the objections previously made to the votes or papers from any State shall have been finally disposed of.

SEC. 3. That while the two houses shall be in meeting, as provided in this act, no debate shall be allowed and no question shall be put by the presiding officer, except to either house on a motion to withdraw; and he shall have power to preserve order.

SEC. 4. That when the two houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of an electoral vote or votes from any State, or upon objection to a report of said commission, or other question arising under this act, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question ten minutes, and not oftener than once; but after such debate shall have lasted two hours, it shall be the duty of each house to put the main question without further debate.

SEC. 5. That at such joint meeting of the two houses seats shall be provided as follows: For the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, immediately upon his left; the Senators in the body of the hall upon the right of the presiding officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the hall not provided for the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon each side of the Speaker's platform. Such joint meetings shall not be dissolved until the count of electoral votes shall be completed and the result declared; and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any such votes, or otherwise under this act; in which case it shall be competent for either house, acting separately, in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess of such house not beyond the next day, Sunday excepted, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon. And while any question is being considered by said commission, either house may proceed with its legislative or other business.

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act shall be held to impair or affect any right now existing under the Constitution and laws to question, by proceeding in the judicial courts of the United States, the right or title of the person who shall be declared elected, or who shall claim to be President or Vice President of the United States, if any such right exists.

SEC. 7. The said commission shall make its own rules, keep a record of its proceedings, and shall have power to employ such persons as may be necessary for the transaction of its own business and the execution of its powers.

SENATOR MORTON'S SPEECH ON THE BILL.

U. S. SENATE, January 22d.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. The unfinished business is the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877, which is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, as the member of the committee who did not agree to this bill, I have thought it proper that I should make a brief statement of the grounds on which I did not concur with my colleagues; but I am not well this morning and am unable to speak as I should desire. Still, as the bill is about to come to a vote apparently, I will very briefly state the reasons why I could not give my assent to its being reported.

This bill is presented for the consideration of Congress under very peculiar circumstances. The Congress of the United States is scarcely left free for its consideration. We are aware that there is great uneasiness in the public mind throughout the country; apprehensions are entertained of violence, of revolutionary action on the part of the House of Representatives, of some course being taken that may result in disturbing the peace of the country. A member of Congress has said in a speech in this city that 100,000 men would be here on the 14th of February to witness the counting of the votes. That may be regarded as an extravagant utterance, but it is one of very many of the kind that come up to us from different parts of the country, so that the business interests of the country have become alarmed, and there is a disposition to take almost any measure that may be proposed that will give assurance of peace without very much regard to the character of the measure.

THE BILL A PRODUCT OF THE MISSISSIPPI PLAN.

I do not think I am at all out of the way when I say that this bill is a literal product of "the Mississippi plan;" that the shadow of intimidation has entered this chamber, and that in proposing this bill, and in the consideration of it, members of the Senate and of the House are acting under the apprehension of violence, of some great revolutionary act that will threaten the safety and continuance of our institutions. I do not myself believe in the reality of this danger. I believe that this sort of talk is intended for a purpose, and I very much fear that it will accomplish that purpose. The real danger that we are in results from weakness, results from timidity, results from not daring to stand up to do our whole duty as we understand it.

It is said by geologists that there was a period in the history of the earth's crust when there were skull-less vertebrates; and it would seem now that we have come to that period when there are vertebrateless skulls. The thing to do is to do what is right, and to do it fearlessly. For one, I am not afraid that, if this vote shall be counted as it was for the first seventy-two years in the history of our Government, there will be any revolution ; I believe that any one who attempts it will be utterly destroyed.

I regard this bill, Mr. President, as a compromise. It will take its place alongside of the compromise of 1820, and the compromise of 1850. By the compromise of 1820, all the territory south of 36° 30' was given over to slavery ; and, when the time came to settle the territory north of that line, the compromise was destroyed. By the compromise of 1850 the institution of slavery got the immediate benefit of the fugitive-slave law, which gave it such prestige, power, and confidence as made it aspire to the complete conquest of the country.

HAYES ELECTED ACCORDING TO LAW AND IN THE HEARTS OF THE PEOPLE.

I believe that Rutherford B. Hayes has been elected President of the United States ; he has been elected under the forms of law and according to law, and that he is elected in the hearts of the people ; and I believe that if he should be counted in, as eighteen Presidents were successively counted in from the beginning of this Government, he would be inaugurated and there would be no violence and no revolution.

There have been upon this question a great many loose opinions given from time to time on the first impression, without examination, and perhaps most Senators have indulged in them, so that very few can entirely claim to be consistent. I have indulged in them myself. But within the last few weeks this question has been presented as a case in hand, not simply as a matter speculative, something to come in the future ; and there has been a flood of light poured upon it such as had never been before ; many new things have been discovered, many things have been said, and we have the counsel of the best legal minds all over the country.

I brought forward a bill some two years ago, which was afterward reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, for the purpose of having a law for the counting of the electoral vote. I did not claim that that bill was perfect. It was not in view of any contingency or case. It, however, was in one respect a safe bill, and that is, leaving out of view who should count the vote, whether the President of the Senate or the two houses, it contained no word by which the two houses could be authorized to go behind the returns of a State, to go behind the decision made by the returning officers of the State appointed by the State for that purpose ; and the bill of 1800, if I remember correctly, expressly provided that the two houses should not go behind the returns so far as to count the votes for electors. I am not an advocate for State sovereignty ; I never have been ; but I have been a consistent advocate of State rights as I am now. The Constitution of the United States confers upon the State the power to appoint electors in such a way as the Legislatures of the States may prescribe. This is the absolute right of each State. The mode of appointment is left to the Legislature of the State. The determination as to who have been appointed is left entirely to the State.

Should Congress assume to determine who have been appointed so far as to go behind the action of officers of the State appointed by the laws of the State for that purpose, Congress would absorb to itself the entire power, would become a grand returning board, without limit and without restraint. The very moment we undertake to go behind the determination of the officers of the State as to the result of a State election and to count and determine the result for ourselves, that moment we establish a revolution which ultimately will be the end of Presidential elections. I am not now referring to the certificate of the Governor, which is prescribed not by State laws but prescribed by the act of Congress ; but I am referring to that determination of the result of elections as prescribed by the laws of the States. The States have the right to appoint electors ; the Legislature has the right to prescribe the method ; and the evidence as to the appointment, as to who has been appointed, is left to the States as absolutely and as completely as the appointment itself.

I listened to the very able speech of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds] on Saturday last with great interest. If I understood him correctly he assumed that there was no provision of the Constitution that executes itself except one, and that is in regard to the recovery of fugitives from labor, fugitive slaves ; that the rest of the provisions of the Constitution are not self-executing, but require legislation to carry them into operation. He made a distinction, I believe, which is correct, that there are two classes of powers conferred by the Constitution. Where a power is conferred directly upon any department of the Government by the Constitution, that power cannot be taken from that department ; that power cannot be delegated ; but where the Constitution simply imposes a duty, but does not vest any particular department with the performance of that duty, then Congress may by law determine who shall discharge that duty.

If I understood the Senator aright, he took the ground that the counting of the votes was a duty imposed by the Constitution, but that the Constitution had not located it, had not said who should do it. He denied that the duty was imposed upon the President of the Senate. He said the President of the Senate was directed to open all the certificates, but he was not directed to count them. He was directed to open them "and the votes shall then be counted." The power and duty to count were not located in the two houses; the Constitution did not say that any more than it said the President of the Senate should count them. It said the votes should then be counted. Assuming, for the sake of the argument, his position to be true that there is nothing in the Constitution, any part of it, that indicates that the President of the Senate shall count the votes as well as open them; assuming it to be true that the Constitution simply imposes a duty to count the votes, but does not say by whom the duty shall be performed, and therefore that Congress is left free to impose the performance of that duty upon a commission and upon any person it sees proper to put in that situation, his position would be tenable. The Senator in applying that to this case made use of the following language:

"But, as I have said, I only intended on this occasion to explain in as brief a way as I could exactly what the bill is and in a general way the grounds upon which it rests. The illustrations that might be still further made to show that this deciding power of which I am speaking does not rest with you, and as I think to show equally that it does not rest with either house of Congress until Congress provides a law that allows it to rest there, are so numerous that the whole day might be spent upon them."

The position of the Senator is that the Constitution created the duty to count the votes, but did not locate the power or duty anywhere, and that Congress, under the general power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers given to any department or to the Government of the United States, may by law devolve that duty upon a commission or upon any person. If I do not state his position correctly, I hope he will correct me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if the Senator wishes me to correct him now, he states a part of my position correctly, but he only states half of it; but I will take the opportunity to correct him, so as not to disturb him afterward.

Mr. MORTON. Well, Mr. President, I am stating the Senator's position correctly and fully as I understand it, and I understand this position of his to be necessary to another part of his argument, because if the power to count the votes, which I believe he expressly disclaims, is lodged in the two houses by the Constitution and is not a general power to be executed by law, then this power must be exercised by the two houses only and cannot be delegated; whereas if it is simply a duty imposed to count the vote then Congress may locate that duty wherever it sees proper by law. The position of the Senator is that neither the President of the Senate is vested with this power nor are the two houses of Congress, that neither can exercise it in the absence of a law passed for that purpose.

IMPORTANT PRECEDENTS CITED.

And this brings us then to a very great fact, which is that for eighty-four years Presidents were counted in and inaugurated without any authority in point of law by any person. The President of the Senate had no power to do it because there was no law authorizing him to do it. The two houses had no power to do it because there was no law authorizing them to do it. It was a part of the Constitution which had not been carried into operation by legislation. Now, sir, is it true that for eighty-four years Presidents were counted in and inaugurated without authority of law? That would be a very great discovery if it were true. It would show that the men who made the Constitution did not understand it. I believe that they thought the first President and all succeeding Presidents were counted in and inaugurated according to law. They may have been mistaken. Their opportunities for knowing what the Constitution is were not so good as ours, I suppose. They undoubtedly believed that the votes were properly counted for George Washington, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, and so on.

I believe that this power is vested somewhere, located somewhere, that if it does not belong to the President of the Senate it belongs to the two houses. It is in one place or the other. But whatever may be the location, in theory, that the two houses cannot exercise this power without legislation I think is correct. I think the Senator from Vermont occupies a sound position in that respect; and whatever we may say about the power of Congress to legislate, and conceding that, as I have done heretofore and have presented bills to this chamber upon that hypothesis heretofore, yet that in the absence of legislation the President of the Senate must count the votes, that this results not from any theory but results from necessity to prevent a deadlock, to prevent the Government from coming to a stand-still, that until legislation has been had under which the vote can be counted by the two houses or providing some tribunal for it the President of the Senate must count the vote, and the vote was counted for seventy-two years upon that theory. If that theory was not correct, then it was unlawfully counted without authority, and for three-quarters of a century this Government proceeded illegally. Chancellor Kent stated the law on this subject as I think it has been generally understood in Congress and out of it until very recently :

"The President of the Senate, on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors, in the presence of both houses of Congress, opens all the certificates, and the votes are then to be counted. The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In the case of questionable votes, and a closely-contested election, this power may be all-important; and I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result, and that the two houses are present only as spectators, to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice be made by the electors."

Now, conceding as Chancellor Kent seems to do, that there may be legislation on the subject, a doctrine to which I have subscribed, yet in the absence of legislation the President of the Senate must count the votes to prevent the Government coming to a halt, and he has counted the votes for eighty-four years, at least for seventy-two, from 1789 until the time of the adoption of the twenty-second joint rule. I do not intend now to go into an argument as to the right of the President of the Senate to count this vote against the powers of Congress. I am simply stating what I have heretofore understood to be the general doctrine, that in the absence of legislation the President of the Senate must count this vote; that if now we fail to agree upon a bill, we should simply leave this question where it has been left for eighty-four years; and that the President of the Senate in counting this vote will be guilty of no greater usurpation than he has been guilty of for three-quarters of a century.

We are discussing this bill in the presence of a case. We are discussing it in the presence of an actual condition of things. I shall be

ANXIOUS TO HAVE A FAIR BILL ADOPTED.

I was exceedingly anxious to agree with the committee in the recommendation of a fair proposition; but when we are preparing a bill in the presence of a case made up, ready to be tried, the papers all signed and in due order, I insist that it shall be a fair bill under which the condition of things shall not be unfairly changed.

As I said before, I believe

R. B. HAYES IS ELECTED PRESIDENT, elected upon the papers, elected under every form of law; that he ought to be inaugurated, and that he must be inaugurated unless a bill shall be passed which shall allow him to be counted out in defiance of the well-settled principles of law. I am not well enough, Mr. President, to go into this question to-day as I should like to do.

I wish to say a few words in regard to this bill. If the power to count this vote is vested in the two houses, and is not in the President of the Senate, then the duty must be performed by the two houses; it cannot be delegated. This was the precise point, as I understood it, of the argument of the Senator from Vermont, because, if he were to admit that the power is vested in the two houses under the Constitution, he would be compelled to admit, good lawyer as he is, that that power cannot be delegated; but by placing it as a floating power, that is located nowhere until it is located by an act of Congress, then Congress would have the right to deposit this power with a commission.

THE JUDGES TO BE POLITICAL JUDGES.

The commission created is a mixed commission, partly inside and partly outside, five Senators, five Representatives, and five judges. The judges are taken, not because they are judges, not because they are members of the Supreme Court, but because they are men of eminent character who happen to occupy that position. Four of them are chosen by circuits. The Senator from Vermont hardly did himself justice on Saturday when he argued that they were chosen by circuits on account of geographical distribution. They were chosen by circuits, as I understand it, not because of geographical distribution, but because of the political antecedents of the men who preside in those circuits. When the bill, instead of naming the judges, names the circuits, it presents a harmless little sham that deceives nobody.

Four judges are taken by the bill because of their political antecedents, two on each side. In other words, the judges are selected upon political grounds, equally divided, it is said, in order to make the bill a fair one. Nevertheless, selection is made in the Supreme Court on political grounds. If we are to deal with the Supreme Court—and I confess I looked upon that proposition with more favor than the other—I thought we ought to have taken the whole court, and not admit by any form of provision that we believed politics entered into the court; not divide it up on political grounds; not assume that the duties of that court are liable to be influenced by their political prepossessions, but take the whole court as a court. I thought that the least objectionable. It is true the other day, when there was a constitutional amendment here referring this matter to the Supreme Court, I voted against it; but I did so chiefly because it re-enacted the electoral college and re-enacted an election of President by the House of Representatives by States. But if we are to take an outside tribunal it seemed to me to be far better that we should take the court and take it as a court, take all the judges, and not pick around them to get an equal number on political grounds. I thought that was a blow at the court and would do it more injury than any course that could be taken. They are to take a fifth. Four judges are to select a fifth.

ILLEGAL MANNER OF APPOINTING THE JUDGES.

Here is a very grave question presented, right at the threshold: What is the character of these commissioners? Are they officers? They are sworn; the very highest duty is imposed upon them, the decision of the greatest case that can arise under our institutions. If they are officers, are they not to be appointed as other officers under the Constitution of the United States are appointed? Can we take four men by name and authorize them to appoint the fifth and submit to this court thus organized this great case? Is it not a court to all intents and purposes? You call it a commission, but names are nothing. It is a court invested with the very highest jurisdiction to decide both law and fact, expressly charged with deciding the question, What are the powers of each or of both houses of Congress? and expressly charged with finding the fact as to who have been elected electors for President of the United States. If it is a court, should it not be appointed as the Constitution requires other courts to be, and if these men are public officers, should they not be appointed as officers of the United States are required to be appointed? This is a contrivance, to use the very mildest words, a contrivance, a patched-up thing, five Representatives, five Senators, four judges first, and they to choose a fifth, and thus this tribunal is to be created that is to make a President of the United States. There are no analogies for it in our Constitution or in our laws or in our history. We have no tribunals made up in that way.

THE TRIBUNAL ILLEGAL.

If we were to make this tribunal exclusively in the two houses, make it consist of Representatives and Senators entirely, and stop there, the question would then arise, can we do it? If the decision of this question belongs to the two houses, can you leave it to a few members of these two houses and agree to be bound by their decision? Can you pass a law in that way?

Can you by joint resolution or by bill authorize a conference committee to pass a law and to make it binding unless it is reversed by a majority of both houses. Committees are but facilities of Congress, and their action amounts to nothing unless ratified by Congress. The decision of a conference committee amounts to nothing in point of law until after both houses shall have confirmed its action; but here you create a commission partly of Senators, partly of Members, and partly of the Judges of the Supreme Court, and you provide that the finding of that commission shall be valid unless reversed by a majority of both houses. Here is a clear delegation of power. If it were provided that the finding of that commission should not be valid until confirmed by both houses of Congress, there would be no delegation of power. You could just as well provide that it shall be binding unless reversed by two-thirds of each House, or you could provide that it should be absolutely binding and that there shall be no appeal at all. Here you create a court and you give an appeal from this court not to a higher court known to the Constitution of the United States, but you give an appeal to the Congress of the United States, provided that if the appeal shall be sustained by both houses concurrently the decision of the court below shall be reversed. I will say one word further in regard to the bill.

It is a fundamental principle of law, in connection with the election of a President, in preserving and defining the rights of the States, that the action of the States shall be received unquestioned by the Congress of the United States, or by that power, whatever it may be, that shall count the vote; and any authority conferred upon this commission, or that might be conferred by an act of Congress upon the President of the Senate or any other agency selected to go behind the returning board of a State and count the votes, would be, in my judgment, a gross violation of the spirit and letter of the Constitution, revolution, and the end of Presidential elections under our system.

I wish briefly to call the attention of the members of the Senate to this bill. I speak of the jurisdictional part, that part conferring jurisdiction upon this commission, and it is the vital part of the bill. We need not deceive ourselves for a moment about this business. We know that both parties are looking intently to that question and at that particular point. We may affect to be oblivious of it here, but we understand that the decision of this Presidential question depends absolutely upon that question, for if the principle shall stand that the action of the State authorities, those that are appointed to count the votes and to say by State laws who are elected, Rutherford B. Hayes is elected and Mr. Tilden cannot be counted in except by overturning that principle. It is all in that, and the able lawyers of the Democratic party on this floor and everywhere understand that just as well as we do. I call attention to that part of this bill which gives the jurisdiction to this tribunal:

"Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one Member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said commission, which shall proceed to consider the same; with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two houses acting separately or together."

I may here remark that the bill proceeds upon a theory different from that of the Senator from Vermont, in his argument. He assumes that the Constitution does not locate this power anywhere, but that it is to be located by law, while this bill goes upon the hypothesis that this power is located in the two houses, and that this commission shall have what the two houses have, more or less—

"which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two houses acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration."

First, they are required to find what were the constitutional votes of a State. They are required to do a thing there which in my opinion the Constitution does not authorize, whether the power to count the votes be vested in the President of the Senate or in the two houses. They are required to find, for example, under that provision whether the electors were eligible or ineligible as to their qualifications, while I maintain there is no time or place under the Constitution when the votes are counted for an inquiry of that kind. The duty is short and simple. The President of the Senate shall open the certificates in the presence of the two houses and the votes shall then be counted. There is but one thing to do and that is to count the votes. There is no time, there is no place to try the question of the eligibility of the electors.

Suppose it should be said, if you please, that the President himself, the candidate, is not a citizen of the United States; that he is not eligible to be elected, and that that charge should be made when the votes are counted. The candidate takes issue; he says he is a citizen; was born in this country, or he says he is thirty-five years old. That may be denied. An issue of fact arises. Can you try that issue then? Will you count him out because you say he is not thirty-five years old when he says he is? You cannot try that question of fact then. Will you count him out because it is said he was not born in the United States? He says that he was; that there are those living who were present and can prove it. If that issue is made you cannot possibly try it at that time. And so with regard to electors. If they suggest that an elector was not eligible, that he was postmaster, if you please, he may deny the fact; he may insist that he had resigned before that time, and his resignation had been accepted. Is there any time or place there to try the issue of fact, whether he was eligible or not; whether he was postmaster or not; whether he was qualified or not to become an elector? No, Mr. President, whoever may count the votes, there is no time or place when you count the votes to try that question.

The two houses are to come together. The President of the Senate is to open all the certificates. That does not mean every kind of certificate that may be placed in his possession. It does not mean any paper that may purport to be a certificate, but he is to open all the certificates from the electors of the several States and the votes shall then be counted, the votes in those certificates, be they good, bad, or indifferent, be they for an alien, or be they for a citizen of the United States. At that time and at that place there is but one thing to do, and that is to count the votes. It may be said that the candidate is not qualified to be elected; it may be said that the elector was not qualified to be an elector, but you cannot try that issue of fact then and there; there is but one thing to do, that is to count the votes. The President of the Senate has his duty, and that is to open the certificate that comes from the electors of the States. He is not bound to open certificates from pretended authority, from outsiders, from persons unknown officially. I am going on a little further, Mr. President.

NO POWER TO GO BEHIND THE RETURNS FROM THE STATES.

This bill requires this commission to find the facts, whether these electors were duly appointed. We will just put the word "elected" instead of "appointed," for in this connection it means the same thing.

They are required to find were these electors duly appointed? They are not required to find whether they have been duly certified by the State authorities as having been elected. No, sir; but they are required to find the fact were they duly appointed or elected? If it had said that this commission shall find how many electors there were, and whether they were duly certified as having been elected by the State authorities or the returning board created for that purpose, we could understand that; but they are required to find the facts as to who was elected, and thus, as I apprehend this bill, they are required to go behind the returns from the States. If it was intended that they should find who had been certified by the States as having been appointed or elected, that would be simple and easily understood; but the bill quietly and innocently requires the commission to find the fact as to who was duly elected. Then it provides that for that purpose they—"May therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration."

In finding the fact as to who was duly elected, they are authorized to take into consideration petitions, unsworn evidence, depositions, papers of all kinds, reports, everything that may be put in for the information of Congress. If these things are not to be considered in determining who has been elected, then the reference is useless. If this commission is to be controlled by the State authorities, by those who have been certified as elected by the returning officers of the several States, then they have no occasion to look at these petitions, memorials and reports. The bill invites them to look at these papers, invites them for a purpose, and there can be no use in looking at them if the other principle of law is to be observed, that they are to be governed by the returns made by the officers of the several States.

Now, Mr. President, I think I do the intelligence of these distinguished democratic Senators but justice when I say that they would not go for this bill except that it gave them a chance for the only thing that can count Mr. Tilden in, and that is to go behind the returns. Outside of that he has no chance, no possible hope; and that these distinguished and eminent lawyers go for a bill which at the very beginning cuts off and shuts out this their only hope, I must be excused for saying that I do not believe it.

THE VOTE.

The debate was continued until Thursday morning, January 25th, when, after a night's session, a vote was taken with the following result:

YEAS.—Alcorn, Allison, Barnum, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Chaffee, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill, Price, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, Stevenson, Teller, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, Windom, Withers, Wright—Total, 47.

NAYS.—Blaine, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conover, Dorsey, Eaton, Hamilton, Hamlin, Ingalls, Mitchell, Morton, Patterson, Sargent, Sherman, West—Total, 17.

THE WORK OF THE FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

THE RETURN.

Congress did not yield the time so fully during the holiday season, as it has done in former years. There was not really what may be termed a substantial vacation, as the two houses successively adjourned over the three customary days to suit their own convenience. These adjournments continued so that in case of emergency Congress might immediately convene. The principal reason, however, seems to have arisen from the request of Mr. Morrison, the Democratic chairman of the House Investigating Committee, sent to Louisiana to ferret out the alleged election frauds of the Republicans, and who was then anxious to compel certain parties to break the seal of secrecy and give up papers, telegrams, and documents, which it was hoped by the Democracy would be damaging to the Republican party. Hence, the machinery of Congress was kept going from time to time through the holidays, and Speaker Randall stood by the bellows, occasionally forcing a puff on the fire to keep it from going entirely out. At last, however, the Members, many of whom had gone away in spite of the public emergency, came back to their work, and about Wednesday or Thursday, January 4th, 1877 the Congress had settled down to steady business for the balance of the session.

ROUTINE BUSINESS.

During the last month the morning hour in both houses has been spent in presenting and briefly considering a great variety of memorials, resolutions, and bills proposed or reported, which are referred to their appropriate committees or otherwise disposed of. Private bills have, however, received very little attention. The lobby men and women, though in large numbers hovering about Congress, have not been able to make much progress with their various schemes for plundering the public treasury, although it would appear that the rigid virtue of retrenchment and economy displayed by the Democratic House last year has perceptibly relaxed since the event of November last.

The regular appropriation bills are only advancing at a snail's pace through their customary long and circuitous legislative route, none of them having yet reached the end of the journey and entered into a condition of law. The affairs of the District have received some attention. Matters pertaining to the pavement of Pennsylvania avenue, to Glenwood cemetery, to an appropriation of $20,000 for the relief of the poor, to a form of government for the District, to a reform school for girls, and to the present organization of the Police Commissioners and the police force have claimed the attention of Congress. The Silver Commission, authorized at the last session of Congress, are still at work collecting and collating materials for their report. The rules of the Senate, which have for the last two years been under revision at the hands of the committee of which Senator Ferry of Michigan and President pro tem. of the Senate is chairman, have at length been adopted, and a very great and good work has thus been accomplished. The action of Congress on the broad question of the Pacific railroad acts, which looks to the use of these important lines of communication by the Government for the public convenrepresentatives. These, with other minor matters in the regular order of legislative business, comprise about all that has been done by Congress since the holidays.

RECUSANT WITNESSES.

An important question has been raised in the House upon the refusal of Messrs. Barnes and Orton, officers of the Western Union Telegraph Company, to produce the alleged Republican telegrams sent southward since the November election. After much conflict and opposition the affair has ended by the submission of those two gentlemen to the will of the Democratic majority of the House. This will open a wide field of inquiry and create a demand for the production of all the Democratic telegrams sent over the country during the same period.

The Democratic majority of the House have also insisted that the members of the returning board of the State of Louisiana are in contempt of the House for refusing to produce, on the call of Mr. Morrison, chairman of the House investigating committee in Louisiana, all their documents, papers, &c., relating to the late Presidential election in that State; and two members of the said board being at the Federal capital have been arrested and brought to the bar of the House for this alleged contempt. The matter is, however, at this writing, left undecided.

Meanwhile the elections committee of the House with Mr. David Dudley Field, a New York lawyer and counsel for the robber Tweed, but now a member of the House and of the committee, for chief manager, have been prying into the operations of the national and congressional executive Republican committees, and their communications to the Republicans in South Carolina, Florida, and elsewhere to see if something cannot be unearthed to the scandal of the Republican party. But thus far all these herculean efforts have proved utterly unsatisfactory to the democracy.

At the same time Senator Morton's committee have been following up a money transaction of some $8,000 between certain parties in New York city, and the famous Mr. Cronin, the Tilden elector of Oregon, and others complicated with him in the infamous trick perpetrated in that State by Grover, the Democratic Governor, and the rest of them.

THE INVESTIGATIONS.

The eight or nine committees sent out in December last, to take testimony of election frauds in the several "bull-dozed" States have all finished their work and have returned to Congress with a mass of testimony which it will take weeks if not months to bring to the full knowledge of Congress and the country. That a state of violence and terrorism has existed all through the South, as well as fraudulent voting in some parts of the Northern States, there can be no manner of doubt. But that the majority of the people in the Eastern and Western States can have any conception of the Southern condition as it really is, would seem almost beyond the bounds of possibility. The story now to be told officially will disclose the matter more fully than ever before.

THE PRESIDENT'S USE OF THE TROOPS.

Attempts have been made by the democratic House to bring out the action of the President of the United States in his use of the army, as it would seem with the design if possible to bring such action into disrepute, or make it the foundation of accusation and complaint against the Administration. Calls have been made upon the President for information, and he has just answered by a special message in such a manner as to set the matter forever at rest with every fair-minded man. He states the different sources of information which had come to him showing beyond any reasonable question the disturbed condition of affairs in several of the Southern States. Upon this information he could not fail to act. He gave orders for the disposition of the troops at points where the public peace was threatened, but in no case did they interfere with the lawful and free exercise of the rights of the people. He shows how his predecessors had done the same thing before even on a larger scale, and nobody ever questioned their right or their duty to do so.

COUNTING THE VOTE.

As from the beginning of the present session, the all-absorbing topic in Congress as well as out of it now is the electoral count and the final declaration of the result. This has in one form or other absorbed the attention and engaged the time and labor of both houses. Various propositions have been submitted both in the Senate and in the House of Representatives by individuals and from standing committees. Memorials on the subject from various parts of the country and from various classes of citizens have been presented, all urging a peaceful adjustment of the present difficulties. Protracted discussions upon the whole subject have followed. In the meantime the joint committees of the two houses, appointed to report a mode of counting the votes, have devised a plan which was signed by all the members of the two committees with the exception of Senator Morton. The report of the committees with the bill agreed upon by them was then presented. This report and bill will be found on pages 124-134.

ARMY VULTURES.—There are bad men who live upon the misfortunes of others. There are men who would plunge the nation into civil war so as to better enable them to plunder their neighbors. A yoke of oxen could not drag them into the service. They are not fighters; they are bummers and thieves who hang on the outskirts of an army ready to descend upon it like so many hungry vultures at the proper time, to feed and fatten upon the carcasses of the slain. This is the class that is shouting for Tilden or war! If they should get Tilden they would be as valiant as Falstaff astride the dead body of the gallant Percy. If they should bring about war, they would sneak to the rear, and while honest people cut each others' throats, they would rob their homes and steal away the substance of the soldiers' widows and orphans.

Out upon this class of public enemies! They should be scourged with the lash, and if this fails to impart wisdom, they should be sent to stand guard over the Black Hills during a few months of winter. If, after this experience, they still clamor for war, they should be sent to capture Sitting Bull or transferred to the Mexican army.

THE REPUBLIC PUBLISHING COMPANY.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

$2 PER ANNUM, IN ADVANCE.

THE REPUBLIC,

A Political Science Monthly Magazine.

The fifth volume of THE REPUBLIC commenced in July, 1875.

As in the past the highest ambition of its publishers will be to render THE REPUBLIC a reliable medium of information on all subjects connected with Republican government—Federal, State, and municipal. Washington, in his Farewell Address, justly claimed that “In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.” The object of THE REPUBLIC writers is not only to educate the people—and especially our young men who are now stepping upon the stage of public life—in the principles of political science, but to impress upon every official conscience the sacred obligation of fidelity to the public interests. It was Benjamin Rush who uttered the great truth that “nothing can be politically right that is morally wrong,” and he, too, pronounced the equally logical axiom that “virtue is the soul of the public.” It will be the duty and aim of THE REPUBLIC to inculcate these and similar truths, to commend integrity and fidelity, to sustain patriotic statesmen in all laudable efforts, to establish and perpetuate the principles of good government; and in this way to contribute to the advancement of the physical, intellectual, and moral condition of the people, as well as to the national prosperity, virtue and power.

THE REPUBLIC will continue to chronicle faithfully the current action of the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Departments of the Government, to comment impartially upon the acts of public men, and to do what may be done within its sphere to inform the people and improve the Government.

The fifth volume of THE REPUBLIC will be printed from a new and handsome type. Other important improvements will be introduced in the variety, arrangement, and make-up of the magazine. Under an enlarged corps of the ablest writers a broader field of political review and discussion of national questions will be adopted; and it is believed that the new volume will be a decided improvement in every way upon its predecessors.

TERMS:

THE REPUBLIC is a magazine of sixty-four pages, published monthly, at $2 a year, or six copies for $10. The postage, in all cases, after January 1, 1875, will be paid by the publishers. A few copies of the back volumes may yet be obtained, either bound or in numbers. Remittances should be made by postal money-order or registered letter.

GROWTH OF THE NATION UNDER REPUBLICANISM.

The Republican party, as a political organization, dates its history from 1856. It came into power March 4, 1861, and from that time to the present, it has been responsible for the administration of national affairs.

Has it been faithful to its trust? This question has been passed upon by the people three times since 1861. First, in 1864, in Mr. Lincoln's re-election; second, in 1868, at the election of General Grant; third, in 1872, when the people returned the present incumbent by the largest popular majority ever given to a President. Thus it would appear that up to 1872, at least, the people had an abiding faith in Republicanism, and by their votes proclaimed to the world that the party had been faithful to its trust. Has it done anything since the last popular endorsement, to forfeit the confidence and good will of the American people? We think not, for we believe its public services have been as faithfully performed since 1872, as they were before. If it has made mistakes, it has been quick to correct them—and in this it has shown a desire to conform to the wishes of a nation that has entrusted it with power for the past fourteen years. This prompt reflection of the popular will has been a leading trait in the character of Republicanism. All its public measures have been based upon public wants, and to discover these wants, and to administer to them, have been the chief aim and object of the party.

As we are on the eve of a political campaign whose issues are to have a direct bearing on the Presidential campaign of 1876, it is well to briefly review the past history of the Republican party, and to again ask the question, "has it been faithful to its trust?"

The trust confided to its care in 1861, was the nation itself. Never was a more sacred trust given to a party to keep, and never has one been guarded with equal fidelity, or with more religious care.

To this fidelity and this care the people of the United States are indebted for the Government they now enjoy. It must ever remain as a recognized fact worthy of historic preservation, that the Republican party took up the theory of self-government and made it a grand success, at the very moment when Democracy proclaimed it a failure.

Democracy had abandoned all hopes of saving the Union, had announced its willingness to see its bonds severed, had proclaimed its determination to make no efforts to stay the tide that was sweeping the nation to certain destruction, when the loyal people called the Republican party into power and gave into its hands a trust which Democracy was about to betray.

A nation without credit at home and abroad, its treasury nearly bankrupt, its currency insecure, its navy scattered, its army small and demoralized, its authority repudiated and defied in eleven States, its Southern forts and arsenals in the hands of insurgents, a powerful political party which had been instrumental in bringing about this disastrous state of affairs—holding sufficient influence to prevent unity of action, was a fair picture of the condition of the trust when Republicans came into power.

It was a moment of extreme peril to the nation—the darkest period in its history. True, the enthusiasm of the loyal millions as they rallied to the support of the Union, lightened up this period of gloom, but the actual danger which beset the Union was greater than any before encountered. The South was in open rebellion and the North was divided in sentiment. The Democratic party maintained its organization, and used it to encourage the South and to discourage the efforts of the North. Yet in the face of almost insurmountable obstacles, the Republican party followed the dictates of loyalty and justice, and turned neither to the right nor the left until the rebellion was crushed, and the Union saved. Therefore, to the Republican party, to its wisdom and fidelity, its patriotism and courage, the people owe the existence of the Union. If it had no other claim on the gratitude of the nation than this one of preserving its nationality, it should outweigh all the claims of Democracy, and entitle it to the confidence and support of every loyal American citizen.

But it has other claims. It has not only organized the means for saving the nation, in the face of the greatest rebellion of modern times, but it has, by the operation of wise laws and a liberal policy, developed a growth of material prosperity rarely equalled in the history of nations.

To fully comprehend the advancement made during a single decade of Republican ascendancy, let us briefly compare the condition of the country in 1860, with its condition in 1870, as shown by the 9th census:

INCREASE IN POPULATION.

In 1860 the population of the United States was, according to the census, 31,153,744. Including Territories, 31,443,321. According to the census of 1870, the population was 38,115,641. Including Territories, 38,558,371. The following table shows the population of each division, and the gain in ten years:

STATES.	POPULATION.		GAIN.
	1860.	1870.
Eastern ...	3,135,583	3,487,024	352,641
Middle....	3,258,550	10,158,729	1,900,479
Western ...	9,091,879	12,916,930	3,875,051
Southern...	10,259,016	10,808,379	549,381
Pacific.....	439,316	693,661	254,345
Territories	259,577	442,731	183,153
Total....	31,443,321	38,558,371	7,115,050

The percentage of increase, from 1860 to 1870, was somewhat smaller than that shown between 1850 and 1860. This can be readily accounted for by causes directly traceable to the war. The Surgeon General United States Army fixes the losses of the Union armies, by death, at 304,000—by discharge, 285,000. The Confederate losses are estimated at 300,000. Add to this the large number, on both sides, who died after the close of the war, from causes chargeable to the service, and we have not less than 1,000,000 of the decrease accounted for. The loss of so large a number of able-bodied men would necessarily affect the ratio of births during the decade. Therefore, the difference between the estimated population for 1870—41,609,000—and the actual count—38,558,371—may be properly attributed to the rebellion, and causes directly chargeable to it. Yet, despite these unfavorable causes, which retarded the natural growth of the nation, the close of the first decade of Republican administration finds the nation with a substantial increase of over seven millions. The increase up to the present time, may safely be assumed to reach not less than 11,500,000, making the present population about 42,000,000.

INCREASE IN PRODUCTS OF MANUFACTURES.

The substantial growth in the products of manufactures from 1860 to 1870, illustrate the industrial prosperity of the nation. It is safe to assume that the increase of products of manufactures to June 30, 1874, would be upward of $3,000,000,000. The following table shows the increase from 1860 to 1870:

STATES.	PRODUCTS OF MANUFACTURES.		INCREASE.

GROWTH IN TRUE WEALTH.

The increase of the true wealth of the nation for the same time, will better illustrate the character of the Government which, in a large measure, has been instrumental in bringing it about. This increase shows the wonderful growth of the nation under a single decade of Republican rule, and disposes of the charge so often made by Democracy, that Republicanism has impoverished the country. No better evidence can be found of the fallacy of this assumption than that contained in the impartial returns of the ninth census. From this we tabulate the following :

STATES.	TRUE WEALTH.		INCREASE.

* Decrease. Value of slaves included in 1860.

It will be seen from the above, that the true wealth of every section, with the exception of the Southern, has increased in a marvelous degree—the total increase being nearly $14,000,000,000. The loss of slave property, the value of which was included in the census of 1860, partially accounts for the apparent decrease of the true wealth of the Southern States. To this should be added the general depreciation of real estate, which has taken place in every Southern State with the exception of Kentucky and Tennessee.

ASSESSED VALUATION OF REAL ESTATE.

The following table shows the decrease in the assessed valuation of real estate in the the Southern States, from 1860 to 1870 :

* West Virginia not included in 1870. † Increase.

The great falling off in the assessed valuation of real estate in the Southern States as indicated in the table given, is due, not so much to the destruction which attended the war, as it is to the bitter political prejudices held since its close by the property-owners of the South against Northern capitalists, especially those who favor the Republican party. These prejudices have been so marked, that Northern men, with money to invest, have sought other and safer channels for their investments. Had the South laid aside its political hatred to the Republican party, and extended a cordial welcome to Northern men; skill, industry and wealth would have poured into its States, and ere this, restored to it the prosperity which it lost by the rebellion. Numerically, Republicanism has been stronger in certain Southern States than Democracy, but the latter has controlled the property and moneyed interest, and thus checked the growth which would otherwise have followed the ascendancy of Republicanism. No political party, however pure, can of itself restore prosperity to a people who combine the money power against it. A cordial relation must exist between the party in power and the business elements with which it has to deal, before true prosperity can be attained, and if the South had long since recognized this truth, to-day her real estate would have shown as large an increase in value as that of other sections.

In order to show the increase in the assessed valuation of real estate in those States where the Republican party has had the active sympathy of business men and property owners, we present the following table, collated from the last census :

* Assessed valuation of real estate in 1870, $14,594,722.

The above table indicates an aggregate increase in the assessed valuation of real estate in the Eastern, Middle, Western and Pacific States, during the first decade of Republican rule, of $3,128,501,392, while the Southern States, during the same period, show a decrease in the assessed valuation of real estate, amounting to $365,111,106.

The question may be asked, why has not the Republican party advanced the material interests of those States in the South where it has had control? The answer is, because it has met the organized opposition of the intelligent, wealthy and business elements of those States. Its control has been the control of a majority, cut off by deep-rooted prejudice from the sympathy and support of an influential minority. Thus, insurmountable obstacles have been placed in its way. Its efforts to build up have been met by counter efforts to tear down, and this conflict carried on through a series of years, has borne its natural results, the paralyzation of industry and the stoppage of growth. At the North, active party opposition against a State administration ceases when the ballot announces the people's choice. At the South the opposition of Democracy is intensified by the elevation of Republican officials. The choice of the people is disregarded, the minority refuse to cheerfully submit to the decree of the ballot box, and thus the administration of government lacks that co-operation of effort on the part of all classes essential to a complete development of State interests. If one-half the talent and energy shown by Southern Democracy in obstructing the administration of Republican governments had been used to assist officials in exercising their legitimate functions, the close of the last decade would have revealed an increase instead of decrease in Southern wealth.

The South has many natural advantages, which, if properly used, would make it an attractive field for enterprise and wealth. Its climate, mineral resources, water-power, agricultural privileges, fine harbors and magnificent rivers, ought to have largely increased its population and trebled its wealth in ten years. Why has it failed to advance? Why has it fallen behind? The reason may be found in the narrow political prejudices which have created a policy of exclusiveness that has shut her gates against the enterprising men of the world. In still clinging to a political party that once led them to the brink of ruin, the property owners of the South are committing an act of suicidal folly. By ignoring the party of freedom and progress, which has advanced by its wisdom and energy other sections of the country, the South is putting off the day of prosperity. If she would keep pace with the North, she must imitate the political freedom which the latter enjoys, and break down, of her own accord, those barriers which pride and prejudice have raised against the principles of Republicanism. By the adoption of these principles the South will close the present decade with a degree of prosperity beyond her hopes. The surplus wealth of the North will pour in upon her; hardy immigrants will possess her now idle lands; mills and factories will line her water-courses; shipping will crowd her seaports; and she will become what nature seems to have intended her to be—the very garden spot of America.

To bury her prejudices, turn her back on Democracy, and welcome Republicanism, would be to her the beginning of a glorious era.

FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The financial operations of the Government since 1861, illustrate in a marked degree the wonderful resources of the nation, and the integrity of the party that has been responsible for the administration of public affairs. The armed rebellion of eleven States which confronted the Republican party when it assumed control, necessitated extraordinary expenses on the part of the Government, and to meet these expenses, the collection of extraordinary revenues. There was no alternative but heavy expenditures and great sacrifices, or universal bankruptcy and national extinction. True, the full force of the terrible strain to be borne was unknown in 1861, but the party in power never weighed the value of the Union in the scale of dollars and cents. Its preservation was cheap at any price of treasure or blood. It was priceless, not only to the generation which undertook its salvation, but to the countless generations which were to follow. Its defence and preservation were sacred duties, which no loyal citizen could overlook. Freedom, humanity, intelligence, all depended upon the issue; and with its successful termination, each of these elements of human civilization became more deeply rooted in American soil.

We have already shown the material prosperity which the Union has developed. This far outweighs the money expenditures made necessary by four years of war. The compensation for the bloodshed cannot be found in dollars and cents. The elevation of the human race, the extinction of human bondage, the erection of free States throughout the world, and the future preservation of hundreds of thousands of lives which would be sacrificed in the defence of separate nationalities—are among the legitimate fruits which will spring up from the graves of the Union defenders.

The value of the work being conceded, let us look at the means made necessary to accomplish it; the revenues and expenditure of the nation during its struggle for existence.

A careful estimate, made in 1872, of the expenses incurred for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871, showed that the expenditures growing out of the war—such as pensions, interest, premiums, claims, collection of the internal revenue, additional cost of army and navy, payments for illegal captures, suppression of disturbances in the Southern States—amounted to $214,642,081.03. This amount, deducted from the total expenditures of the Nation, $292,177,188.25, left $77,535,107.22 as the ordinary expenses of the Government for 1871 on a peace basis. Reduced to a gold basis—the average price of gold during 1871 being 112.3—it was $69,042,838.13. The expenditures of the Nation for the year ended June 30, 1860, were $61,402,408.64. The population of the United States January 1, 1860, was 31,030,750. The population January 1, 1871, was 38,911,616. This would make the expenditures per capita in 1860, $1.98, and in 1871, $1.77. If we accept the result of this calculation as a fair average of the ordinary expenses of administration, or those which exclude the extraordinary expenditures growing out of, and justly chargeable to the rebellion, we shall have for the fourteen years prior to June 30, 1874, $966,599,733.82 ordinary expenses, instead of $6,465,897,922.84, the actual amount required for those extraordinary expenditures growing out of the war. The difference between the two items, represents the financial sacrifice made by the nation to defend the Union, and to resist the fatal doctrine of State Rights as preached by Calhoun, fought for by the Southern Confederacy, and practically maintained by the Democratic party of to-day.

The following table shows the net revenue of the Government from 1789 to 1860, and from 1860 to 1874; also, the net expenditures of the Government during the same periods:

The tables submitted show, at a glance, the extraordinary expenditures directly due to the rebellion. The work required of the army and the magnitude of military operations, can only be realized by a comparison of the expenditures. The army expenditures for the years 1862, '63, '64, and 1865, amounted to $2,713,569,422.83, or nearly five times as much as the entire army expenses of the Government from 1789 to 1860, a period of seventy-one years. The army expenditures of a single year, 1865—the close of the war—were $1,030,690,400.06, or within a fraction of $3,000,000 for every day in the year.

The nation has been required to pay for the item of interest alone during the past fourteen years, $1,305,042,627.38, as against 196,590,068.09, the amount paid from 1789, to 1860, or more than six and much as the entire amount of by the Government for seven years. The pension payments, also due to the rebellion, show that $830.28 have been paid out, three times the entire pension paid by the Government for the seven years prior to 1860.

If a party is to be judged of its responsibilities, then the party in its administration of the Government cannot fail to invoke the favor of impartial minds. It has been laid upon weaker shoulders which well have destroyed a Government of its magnitude of its labors can be measured by their priceless results will grow in value as generations pass.

If the expenditures show parallel in our history, so that employed, the honesty and energy of the statesmanship which created the necessary to carry the Government through the most active period of its existence be regarded as without parallel in the history of nations.

The wisdom and sagacity which created the internal revenue system, a currency system, should encourage the publican party to the glory of the country. The first made possible the revenues necessary to carry the war to a successful issue. The payment of the taxes uniformed the country, provided a security of equal value in all the States, industry, by removing its earnings, and commanded the acquiescence of the moneyed interests of the country in the security of those interests upon the integrity and credit of the Government.

The present system of internal revenue was created to meet the wants of an emergency. Through those wants were supplied particularly, and without shock or injury to the business of the country. So that the system organized, so equis taxes, levied under it, so cheerfully were they responded to by a loyal people, that the future historian, when he looks for the evidence of those burdens which oppress a people during the prosecution of a great war, will fail to discover that the payment of these countless millions was regarded as oppressive, or checked for a moment the growth of a nation's prosperity.

To show the amount collected under the internal revenue system, and by direct tax, since 1861 to 1874, we submit the following :

Year.	Internal Revenue.	Direct tax.

During the war period, from June 30, 1861, to June 30, 1865, the net expenditures of the Government far exceeded the net ordinary revenue. The following table will show the ordinary receipts and expenditures for the five years named :

Year.	Receipts.	Expenditures.
1861...	$11,476,299.49	$62,616,055.78
1862...	51,919,261.09	456,379,896.81

To the above receipts should be added $33,561,924.24 received as premiums, and to the expenditures should be added $176,034,714.75 paid for interest, and $1,717,900.11 paid as premiums, making the total net receipts for the five years named $814,496,559.72, and the total net expenditures for the same time, $3,419,741,021.43, or more than four times the amount of the receipts. It will thus be seen that the expenditures exceeded the receipts during the five years of war, $2,615,244,461.71.

To meet this excess, the nation was forced to look outside of its ordinary revenues, and the amount needed was provided by its loans and Treasury notes. These loans make up the bulk of our present National debt. The following shows the yearly payment for interest from 1861 to 1874 :

OFFICIAL INTEGRITY, REDUCTION OF DEBT, &c.

Yet, with these immense receipts and expenditures, made necessary by the suppression of the Democratic slaveholders' rebellion, the records show a degree of official integrity without a parallel in the history of governments. Vice President Wilson, in 1872, in referring to this subject, said:

"During the war we paid, through the Paymaster's Department of the Army, more than a thousand million dollars. That money was paid sometimes when troops were on their march, sometimes when they were under fire, and we lost less than a quarter of a million dollars. Never, in the history of the human family, was there any higher evidence of integrity. In the war of 1812, in paying out the little money we paid during that war, we lost about two million dollars. Since Gen. Spinner entered upon his office of Treasurer of the United States, $55,000,000,000 have passed through his office, counted by from three to four hundred men and women. We have lost between fifty and sixty thousand dollars in these eleven years, while $55,000,000,000 have gone through the office.

"There has been collected under General Grant's administration, in three years, nearly twelve hundred million dollars—nearly four hundred millions a year; there has been paid out nearly a thousand million dollars—making about twenty-one hundred million dollars. We have lost out of this immense sum, in all the departments of the Government, a million and a quarter—less than a fifteenth part of one per centum!

"We have paid out, during these three years, ninety million dollars, in pensions, and we have had five defalcations, all of them soldiers, and four of them shed their blood for their country. But the Government has not lost a dollar, for the agents made good their accounts, or their bondsmen did it for them."

These remarks are as applicable to-day as when they were uttered. The same honesty and economy which characterized the President's first term have distinguished, in even a greater degree, the first half of his second term.

A very careful calculation of losses sustained was embodied in an official letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in 1872. As equal honesty has been practiced in all the departments since the date of this letter, it may be safely taken as a basis for present calculations. According to this letter, the per cent. of losses to the Government in the collection of internal revenue since March 3, 1839, was less than one-fiftieth of one per cent. of the amount collected, or less than two dollars in ten thousand.

In the collection of the customs for the same time the loss was $28,000, out of $553,000,000, or the one-hundredth part of one per cent., or less than five dollars in every one hundred thousand.

The loss to depositors, through our National banking system, was the one-hundredth and eighty-sixth part of one per cent.—equivalent to five dollars and three-eighths in every one hundred thousand.

The money entries on the books of the United States Treasurer, covering time from June 30, 1861, to January 9, 1872, showed the immense sum of $55,000,000,000, and out of this vast amount the loss was about $55,000, or less than one ten-thousandth part of one per cent., or one dollar in one million of money transactions.

With this exhibit of the financial responsibility of the Republican party, and the official integrity which has characterized its public servants, are we not justified in saying that no just comparison can be instituted between the party now in power and those which have preceded it? To determine its merits, and do full justice to its great services to the Republic, we have but to weigh its acts and its responsibilities with the combined acts of all the administrations, from Washington down. Even then, we can obtain but an imperfect understanding of the magnitude of its labors, and of the power of its influence on the civilization of the world.

The excess of expenditures over receipts, or that which far exceeded the ordinary revenues, and which were met by pledges of public faith, ceased with the close of the war. The public debt had reached its highest point in 1866, being at that time, June 30, $2,773,236,173.69. Since then the revenues of the nation have exceeded the expenditures, leaving a balance each year for the redemption of the public debt. From June 30, 1866, to June 30, 1874, the public debt has been reduced $580,305,705.26. This reduction has taken place in the face of reduced taxation. Under the acts of Congress dated July 13, 1866, March 2, 1867, Feb. 3, 1868, March 1 and July 20, 1868, July 14, 1870, May 1 and June 6, 1872—the Internal Revenue taxation has been reduced from its highest point, in 1866, $309,226,813.42, to $102,409,784.90, June 30, 1874. In this reduction of the public debt, and this descending scale of taxation, we have at a single glance the policy of the administration to maintain the public credit, and at the same time lighten the burdens of the people.

We have endeavored to show, by the statements submitted, the magnitude of the financial operations of the Government during fourteen years of Republican rule. They may safely be held up, as being without a parallel in our history, if not in the history of nations. To carry on these operations through a long series of years, without infringing upon the constitutional rights of a single citizen, or without oppressing the industrial interests of the country, has required the highest degree of administrative and legislative talent, and the highest order of executive integrity. It should be borne in mind that these heavy financial responsibilities were forced upon the country by treasonable Democracy, and that the part performed by the Republican party was simply the execution of an imperative duty which it owed to the Union, to freedom, to humanity and to the world's civilization.

If we would realize the cost of this treasonable Democracy, we must go over the expenditures of each year, and sum up those which are directly chargeable to the Democratic slaveholders' rebellion. They would not only wipe out our present national debt, but restore an equal amount to those who were forced to bear the financial burdens of the conflict.

With these figures before us, with a clear remembrance of those terrible years of sacrifice and suffering, when the hopes of the nation centered in the courage and patriotism of the Republican party, with at least $50,000,000 of yearly expenditures to remind us of a party that betrayed the nation, and with a burdensome public debt, which a loyal people are nobly bearing—who that loves his country, or wishes to see it continue in the path of peace and prosperity, can give his vote or influence to the support of a party that stands to-day as responsible for the rebellion, as it did when its recognized head, James Buchanan, folded his arms and gave it the sanction of his official encouragement, by the admission that he had no power to coerce.

OUR NATIONAL CURRENCY SYSTEM.

We have shown the immense financial operations of the Government during the fourteen years ending June 30, 1874. To those measures which led to the adoption of our present national currency the success of these operations is largely due. Under the old State banking system, financial embarrassments would have attended the collection of the taxes, irredeemable paper money would have become nearly worthless, gold needed for custom duties, and for the payment of interest on our bonds would have become exorbitantly high, the credit of States and individuals would have been destroyed, and before the close of the war, even if such a close had been possible, universal bankruptcy would have stared us in the face.

Therefore to the adoption of our present national currency, the nation is largely indebted for the success of its financial operations. It gave to the country a currency of uniform value; it pledged the faith of the nation for the security of the circulating medium; it removed the possibility of loss on the part of the bill holder, by making the Government the redemption agent; it united the moneyed interests of the country with the efforts of the government to maintain its existence, by making the currency, and through this prosperity, wholly dependent upon the credit and integrity of the nation.

GROWTH OF THE NATION UNDER REPUBLICANISM.

This national currency system operated as a strong bond of union, holding the States to the Government, upon which they depended for financial prosperity. It placed the states in the attitude of creditors, largely interested in maintaining the solvency of the Government.

To this system of currency, due to the wisdom of Republican legislation, the people are indebted for that harmony which existed between the States and the Government, and for that marvelous prosperity, which developed itself in the midst of a devastating war, and which has practically continued unchecked up to the present time.

Under the old State banking system, every financial disturbance entailed heavy losses on holders of bills, while panics like those of 1837 and 1857 wrecked hundreds of banks and entailed hardships upon thousands of individuals holding their notes. Under the present national system, these losses, which generally fell upon the workingmen, are impossible. A bank may be badly managed; it may fail; yet, its notes, being secured by a deposit of United States bonds, are as valuable as the notes of the best managed bank in the country. They continue to circulate, or if the holder desires it, they may be redeemed by the United States. Thus the cir-

may be considered absolutely dollar has been lost by the hold of a broken national bank sinc zation of the system. All that to make the national currenc perfect as any ever devised by dom, is, the redemption of its or its equivalent. If hostile le to business interests.

The Republican party is pledged to the eventual redemption of every obligation, in gold. It has not failed to make good its pledges, and thus has kept with sacred fidelity, if there be any, through the future the same confidence which has upheld the party in the past.

As a comparison of the old system with the present one may be of value, we have the following statement, exhibiting the bank circulation, the amount of deposits, and the ratio of circulation to deposits, and capital, in 1862 (State bank system) and in 1874 :

	BANK CIRCULATION.*		Circulation per Capita		Ratio of Circulation to Wealth.

tional currency, $42,129,424.19; total paper currency, $769,840,119.19. Total circulation per c

A comparative table, exhibiting the above tender note, and the national bank notes by States, may be found in the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, for 1874. In speaking of the relative value of the legal tender note, and the national bank notes, the Comptroller says, in his report:

"The amount of legal tender authorized is $382,000,000; the amount of national bank notes issued is $382,000,000; the amount of legal tender in circulation is $382,000,000; the amount of national bank notes in circulation is $382,000,000."

"The amount of legal tender authorized is $382,000,000; the a tional bank notes, $354,000,000. The amounts of legal tender notes, under the act of June 20, 1874, cannot be reduced, but must remain continually in circulation; the amount of national bank notes, however, may be reduced at the pleasure of the banks. If the value of the paper dollar be determined by the amount of such money in circulation, then the national bank note is more valuable than the legal tender note. The national bank notes outstanding are secured by a deposit of more than $385,000,000 of United States bonds, which are at a premium of more than 12 per cent.

"If the United States bonds be not of sufficient value to pay the notes, the capital and surplus of the banks, amounting to $622,000,000, as well as their entire assets, are available for that purpose. The stockholders are individually liable for the full amount of their stock, in addition to the amount invested in such shares. And the United States guarantees the final payment of the notes. There are, then, absolute assets for more than three times the amount of the national bank notes outstanding, available for the redemption of these notes, and in addition, the contingent liability of the shareholders, and the guarantee of their final payment by the United States."

It will thus be seen that our currency is safe not only in times of business prosperity, but in the midst of financial panics. Founded upon the credit of the Government, nothing but the loss of public credit could affect materially the value of our currency. To maintain this credit, to strengthen it at home and abroad, has been the object of the Republican party. Under its wise management our national credit has steadily improved. Our securities are sought for as among the best and safest in the world, and if the party whose administration has brought about so favorable a result is continued in power, we may confidently look forward to the refunding of our national debt at a low rate of interest, thus in this single item saving annually millions of dollars to the Government. We appeal to true citizens everywhere, to all who desire to maintain the credit of the nation, to all who appreciate a good currency, that is gradually approaching a gold basis, to all who are in any way interested in maintaining public faith, to lay aside petty prejudices and local issues, and earnestly support the party that has rendered noble service to the Republic. Its overthrow means the loss of public credit, the paralyzation of business enterprise, the depreciation of national securities, and eventually a repudiation of national obligations.

A SUMMARY OF ACHIEVEMENTS.

To do justice to a review of Republican achievements would fill a volume. A brief summary will be a fitting conclusion to the statements already made.

During the period of Republican ascendancy, we have seen the nation increase in population from 1860 to 1870, 7,115,050, with an estimated increase, up to the present time, of 11,500,000. We have seen an increase of the products of manufactures during the same time of $2,231,931,594, with a probable increase, up to this time, of over $3,000,000,000. We have seen an increase in the true wealth of the Northern States, up to 1870, $13,908,902,433, which to-day may be estimated at $20,000,000,000. We have seen the assessed valuation of real estate increase in ten years $3,128,501,392, which, at the present time, would make it over $4,000,000,000. We have seen the Government successfully conducting financial operations of great magnitude, and improving its credit, while meeting obligations which bore heavily upon its resources. We have seen a defective State currency system, supplanted by one of a national character, safe, sound and effective, and destined to become, at no distant day, the most perfect currency system ever devised by man. Yet these items of growth and improvements, are but a few of the many that could be presented if time permitted.

The homestead acts; the building of the Pacific railroad; the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments, and the legislation necessary to enforce their provisions; the reconstruction of the Southern States; the settlement of the Alabama Claims, and the vexed San Juan boundary; establishment of life-saving stations; protection to immigrants; encouragement of labor; advancement of science and education; and above all, the crowning work of the century—the abolition of human slavery—are items in the long list of Republican triumphs, which will insure the gratitude of posterity, and ever command the admiration of the world.

This is the party now in jeopardy—the party whose existence is so interwoven with the life of the nation, that to destroy the one is to permanently injure the other.

Is a party record, so glorious and praiseworthy, to be destroyed by the breath of slander, or blotted out from the hearts of a grateful people, by the efforts of partizan malice? Is a party that has given such transcendent evidence of its ability to govern wisely, and justly, and honestly, the affairs of a great nation, to be laid aside, just as the fruits of its noble labors are ripening to the touch? No! We speak for the American people, who are not ungrateful, who still bear in remembrance the services of the past, who are yet unwilling to trust a country saved by loyal blood and treasure in the hands of those who encouraged its destruction—when we say that despite the efforts of Democracy, and the schemes of bad men, the Republican party will still be supported by the loyal element of the country as the only party that has been faithful to its trust, and that is able to protect the nation's honor, while advancing the nation's prosperity.

THE FRENCH REPUBLIC—ITS NEW CONSTITUTION AND THE GUARANTEES.

M. Laboulaye, Chairman of the Committee of Thirty in the Versailles Assembly, who were charged with the consideration of all measures relating to organic laws, declared that the French Republicans of all shades, accepted the compromise measures finally adopted, "through the love of country, in order to obey that requirement of peace and union, which is the desire of a people exhausted by war and tried by revolutions." The speaker, a leader of the left centre or moderates of his party, did not make too large a claim on the respect and admiration of mankind for those who acted with him, in the foregoing declaration. History holds within its ample folds, few events more worthy of praise, than those which have in the main marked the advent of the present Parliamentary Republic of France. That praise is due to the various divisions of the Republican party, which, under the leadership on the one side, of Thiers, Grévy, and other converted Constitutional Monarchists, and of Leon, Gambetta, Laboulaye, Jules Simon, Emanuel Arago and others who have always been Republican in politics, have kept steadily in view the establishment of that form of Government, which, as M. Thiers so tersely put it—"divides France the least."

The constitutional bills under which the Republic in name has been definitely established were adopted in a full Assembly by a majority of 174, on the 25th of February, 1875.

The struggle between Imperialism, Monarchy, and the Republic had continued for over four years, from the date of the establishment of peace, and the removal of the National Assembly, so-called, from Bordeaux to Versailles. That assembly, elected to close the war between Germany and France, refused under the reaction created by the Commune rebellion, to give place to a Constituent Assembly, and succeeded in making itself the government of France, for the time being. At the beginning of this provisional period, the reactionaries had a clear majority of between two and three hundred. When, however, it came to be a question of who should reap the results, the majority divided, and the Legitimists, the Orleanists and Imperialists, could not be induced to agree on an executive or the form of government. The first and third of these factions determined to accept the Comte de Chambord as Henri V., but that logical acceptor of the "right divine of kings," refused to "conquer his prejudices" to constitutional guarantees or a national flag, the tricolor, under which his family had been driven out of France. These parties combined to defeat Thiers and substitute McMahon, but could go no further.

On the other hand time has been the most efficient ally of the Republicans. It has soothed away their own differences; healed the sore partizanship, which is the curse of all political leadership in France, and finally brought nearly all divisions under the acknowledged leadership of Thiers and Gambetta. No man ever gave another more loyal service than the fiery and impetuous Republican orator has accorded the astute and veteran statesman, who, loving the country more than his own opinions, assumed the functions of Republican leadership with the same earnestness that he served King Louis Philippe and opposed Napoleon III.

In the four years of struggle, many members who sat on the Right or Right Centre benches have died. In the vacancies created by death or other means, amounting to about one hundred and fifty, the Republicans have gained largely on the popular vote, carrying at least one hundred and twenty-five of the elections. They have also received accessions from other parties.

It became evident from all these facts that the Republic represented the will of a majority of the PEOPLE of France. As this became more apparent daily, the Republican policy shifted. The Left, while still denying the power of the Assembly to make a definite Constitution, accepted such proclamation of the Republic as is involved in the laws now adopted, and stand ready to go to the country when the Assembly is dissolved.

Under the organic laws adopted last February, working details of which are now being discussed, the Government of France presents the following features :

1. A distinct acceptance of the Republic as the future government of France.

2. A National Assembly to consist of two Chambers.—Senate and Deputies, the latter of which is to be elected by universal suffrage, for three years, unless dissolved by the President, the Senate concurring. A Deputy must be a Frenchman, without civil disability, and not less than twenty-five years of age. If the Chamber of Deputies is dissolved, a new election must be ordered within three months thereafter.

3. The Senate is to consist of three hundred members, to be chosen in the following manner: Two hundred and twenty-five by the departments and colonies, and seventy-five by the Chamber of Deputies. The term of service for Senators is to be for nine years, after the first Senate has adjusted itself thereto, which will be done by selecting one hundred to go out at the end of three years, the same number at the end of six years, and the remainder at the end of nine years. The qualifications for Senator are French citizenship, without any disability; age to be forty years and upwards.

The Senate is to be elected, (except those selected by the Deputies,) by an electoral college in each department and colony chosen in the following manner: the Deputies representing the department; the Consul-General and district (arrondissement) councils, (bodies of an administrative character chosen by the popular vote and not heretofore charged with any direct political functions;) and by delegates from each commune (or municipal township,) in the department—said delegates to be chosen from among the electors, by the Commune council. In this way the bodies charged with the election of Senators will become provincial assemblies, and skillfully handled, must hereafter exercise a great influence in national affairs.

The department of the Seine and Nord, (in which Paris and Havre are situated,) are to have five Senators each. Six others, one near Paris, and in which are Calais, Lyons, Marseilles, and other principal cities, will have four each. Twenty-seven others will have three each; the others two each, and the colonies of Martinique, Guadeloupe, Reunion, and the French Indies (Cochin China, etc.,) are to have one each. There are in all 130 departments. Gambetta has declared that the introduction of the Commune delegates as an agency in the election of Senators, is practically the most Democratic measure yet adopted in France.

The electoral college, so-called, will vote the whole list of its nominees, no Senator to be declared elected without a clear majority of the votes cast. The Chamber of Deputies is to choose its seventy-five Senators by ballot. The Senate must be elected one month before the present assembly dissolves, and to assemble for organization on the day of that dissolution.

4. The two Chambers are to constitute the National Assembly.

This body elects the Chief Executive, or President; votes supplies, declares war or peace, and provides by law for the general operations of the government.

5th. The executive power is vested in a President, to be elected for seven years, and to be twice eligible for re-election. The President is to be commander-in-chief of the military and naval forces; has the right of pardon, but not of veto. Ministers are responsible to the executive, who, however, is liable to impeachment. He makes all appointments, civil and military. Treaties to be negotiated by the Executive, but are not ratified until approved by the National Assembly.

These are the principal features of the organic laws under which the government of France is now being organized. The right to declare war and make peace was first claimed for the executive, but has been settled as stated. The chief topic still under discussion is as to the manner in which Deputies shall be elected—whether by general lists in each department or by separate districts. These are termed respectively scrutin d'liste and scrutin d'arrondissement.

The Republicans and Legitimists in the present assembly support the first named method, and the Napoleonists and Orleanists the second. The reasons are obvious to those who are acquainted with French politics. The administration or executive has so much influence, by reason of its numerous appointments, that its influence and those favoring local celebrities, will be most successfully exerted under the district method; while by the general lists, the great parties and public men of national character will carry far more weight.

It is probable that the parties of the Right and Left will succeed against those of the Centres and the Buffet ministry; while at the polls there seems to be little doubt but that a Republican victory will be obtained. Probably a working majority in the new assembly will crown their sagacious and persistent patriotism. When this question of voting by departments or arrondissements is settled, there will be little left for the assembly at Versailles to do but to prepare for its own dissolution.

A small body of the extremists by Louis Blanc, are, however, fidelity to the policy of conciliation by M. Gambetta. In a recent Blanc declares that the policy was really voted "a non-hereditary in a country where for a century has bequeathed his throne to his historical correctness of the state to have taught M. Blanc that the danger arising from the powers now intrusted to the Executive. The Radical orator holding government to be "only a monarchy, and not that of a Republic summons and dismisses like a king. He appoints all like a king. He can command can be re-elected twice, and go forty-one years."

M. Gambetta's policy, as his speeches and the paper presents him, is very clear and sees plainly that the old order is defensive; that the new order is advancing and aggressive, power of resistance in the future enough (and likely to remain time to come) to hinder any development, or crush any rash effort to-day what could only be safely secured to-morrow. The apprehends that to establish a republic there must be Republic there can be little doubt to observers that a majority have on that side, yet it is equally as the large minority have the weight, with both culture and the prestige of centuries rule behind long breathing spell is wanted in apprehension of Republican in their peaceful formulation in habits and administration there

INFLATION OF THE CURRENCY INJURIOUS.

The necessity which caused the issue of a paper currency to meet the exceptional wants of the war, caused also a great increase in private and national expenditure by disturbing values, and by driving out of circulation the world's currency—gold and silver. It will be observed that the Republican statesmen who prepared the bill governing the issue of currency, were well aware of the effect it would have; and they constantly kept in mind the time when paper should be of equal value with gold. Of course, it is not to be expected that the subject of National finance is scientifically understood by all who are sent as representatives to Congress. And it may be readily conceived that circumstances might arise in which the solution of a difficulty was said to lie in the issue of more greenbacks, or in allowing the issue already out to remain undisturbed. Such persons, especially if they represented communities who had suffered from financial pressure from any cause, were inclined to throw their influence in the direction of the issue of more currency, and of putting further off the period of return to specie payments. But in view of those who had charge of the finances of the country, it required continuous labor to provide for a judicious contraction of the volume of greenbacks in order to pave the way for specie resumption, and for a reduction from ruling prices.

The difference of opinion thus existing has caused delay on various occasions, and led to fluctuations which have raised or depressed values. It has certainly interfered with the approximation of paper with gold, and prevented gold and silver from being accessible to persons who desired that greenbacks might be convertible at will. While the country has so large an amount of paper currency in circulation, a people so disposed to speculate as ours, will do so regardless of its effects. And had no measures been passed to redeem a given amount of greenbacks, and to withdraw and cancel them, that they might never again be issued, a panic might always be threatened by men who thrive on the destruction of others. To guard against panics, therefore, and to restore the circulation to its normal condition, preparatory to still further reduction, inflation in the future is absolutely forbidden.

When there is a redundant supply in the market of any commodity, it is always cheap, no matter what the commodity is. And if there is a redundant supply of paper money in circulation beyond the demands of business, it is always depreciated, because gold goes up. The greenback, therefore, buys less than it would if there was less difference between its face value than its quoted value in gold. To inflate the currency would bring upon the people the reverse of what was expected from it. Prices would rise; and with the rise in price, men of fixed incomes derived from labor, would find that they could not obtain from their labor the necessities and comforts they formerly received when gold was low. As an evidence how inflation ran up prices, we have only to refer to any period when the volume of the currency was increased. Then, the stationary incomes which did not increase, and on which families had lived in economical respectability, were felt to be inadequate unless the expenses were diminished in the ratio of increased cost. This was the experience in thousands of cases; and heads of families who had silently borne the pressure of the times in the hope of better days coming, looked around with sorrow on the fact.

Had Mr. Bristow, the present Secretary of the Treasury, the administration of the Act of Congress of 1866, which provided that $10,000,000 of United States notes or greenbacks might be retired and cancelled within six months from the passage of the act, and under which $44,000,000 were retired by Mr. McCulloch when the provisions of the act were suspended by the act of February 4, 1868. we do not think that he would have sanctioned the reissue of any part of the 44,000,000. At all events, he is decidedly against inflation in any form. And we find that he has directed the retirement and destruction of $1,292,420 in legal tenders, being eighty per cent of new national bank circulation issued during the present month.

THE LIFE SAVING SERVICE AND THE REVENUE MARINE.

There are some things in the history of the past, which show how little the country has been indebted to the Democratic party for its progress and development of the higher instincts of our nature. But there is abundant evidence of noble actions having been performed by individuals or by communities, dwelling on the banks of rivers or by the seashore, who sought to save life at the risk of their own and frequently with pleasing success. Their inspiration, however, was not obtained from the Democratic party. That party was in power for many years, and only relinquished it when Mr. Lincoln assumed the office of Chief Magistrate. The quarter of a century immediately preceding the war, was a most eventful period in our annals. Steam, and railroad and telegraph came into common use. The world beyond took gigantic strides, which were followed by men of energy with us. But the Democratic party was too dull to be influenced by the spirit of progress. The opportunity was presented, but it failed to take advantage of it. National advancement had no charms for the unterrified. To confront the known dangers of navigating our own waters, and to plan the means of rescue, was an occupation too flat, stale and unprofitable to be worth Democratic attention; for the highest ambition of the Democratic party, then as now, was to yield, with proud satisfaction, the control of the country, to the threats of the enemies of liberty, and to shape its legislation in the interest of their patrons. In consequence, there were but few inter-State amenities between the South and the North; few efforts were made to build up that humane sentiment which should mark the nobility of a free and intelligent people; and fewer efforts still were made to carry out those broader views of duty which spring so naturally from the principles of the Republican party, which governed during the war of the Rebellion, and which continue to govern in its dealings with the affairs of men. Fierce political conflict was, however, softened by discussions of the claims of humanity exposed to suffering and peril. One of these discussions led to the consideration of what should be done to lessen the dangers of our coast navigation and to save life and property from shipwreck. And from this arose the Life Saving Service, which is allied to the Revenue Marine.

REVENUE MARINE.

At the beginning of the year 1872, the Revenue Marine consisted of twenty-five steam-vessels, (including two steam-launches), and ten sailing vessels, which, with the exception of two steamers upon the lakes, whose services were not required, were in commission and distributed along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and upon the lakes.

The vessels of the Revenue Marine, patrol our waters chiefly to protect the public revenue against smuggling, and to lend assistance to mariners and vessels in distress. As illustrating the great improvement which has been made in the service during the past two years, the following is a comparative statement of the service rendered by revenue vessels (exclusive of those of a special nature, which cannot be easily ascertained), for each year from 1860 to 1870, inclusive, with those rendered in the last fiscal year. The statement is made by calendar years, because the information happens to be more easily obtainable in that form:

It is proper to say that 1,101 of the 1,594 vessels seized or reported for the violation of revenue law in the last fiscal year were returned by the Jasmine and Uno, the two New York harbor-boats, which, until last year, made no returns; but leaving this number out of the account, there remain 493, being more than three times the number seized and reported in any previous year, and more than four times the average.

The reports for the first quarter of the fiscal year, 1873, indicate great improvement even over the last. They give the number of vessels assisted in distress during the months of July, August and September, as 63; the number seized or reported for violation of law, 539; the number of miles sailed, 57,880; the number of vessels boarded and examined, 10,892; and the number of lives saved, 77.

The running expenses of the service for the fiscal year were $930,249.81, being $190,776.62 less than those of the previous year, and $127,389.19 less than the amount appropriated.

Since 1864 the expenses of sustaining the service have been as follows:

For the fiscal year ended—

June 30, 1865.....	$1,229,434.04
June 30, 1866.....	1,777,230.70
June 30, 1867.....	1,167,125.41

June 30, 1870.....	1,133,670.15
June 30, 1871.....	1,121,026.43
June 30, 1872.....	930,249.81

Previous to 1864 the cost of maintaining the Revenue Cutter Service cannot well be ascertained, the accounts not having been kept separate from the general expenses of collecting the revenue.

Although there has been a steady decrease in expenses from year to year since 1868, as shown by the above statement, the difference between those of the last year and the preceding one considerably exceeds the reduction of all the intervening years.

The increased efficiency and decreased cost above shown are principally due to carrying into effect, as far as practicable, the recommendations of the special commission convened in 1869, and whose report was submitted to Congress, May 20, 1870, and to the strict enforcement of the revised regulations promulgated August 1, 1871, which has effects a thorough re-organization of the service.

The services rendered during the fiscal years of 1872—1874, are shown in the following statement:

June 30, 1873, were	$995,308.88
June 30, 1874, "	903,601.83

This exhibits a reduction of $94,707.05, notwithstanding the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury states that the number of vessels now in commission is thirty-four, of which thirty are steamers and four sailing vessels. They are so distributed as to embrace in their cruising grounds the entire coast of the United States, with the exception of a portion of the Pacific coast, and afford reasonable protection against the smuggling of goods into the country by the cargo. For the portion of the Pacific coast alluded to, a vessel was authorized to be built at the last session of Congress, and plans and specifications for her construction are now in preparation.

THE LIFE SAVING SERVICE.

In 1848, Hon. William A. Newell, a member of the House of Representatives from New Jersey, called the attention of the government to the practicability and duty of providing means for affording relief to vessels navigating the dangerous coast of his State, and advocated the establishment of station houses at suitable intervals, to be furnished with surf boats and other appliances adapted to the purpose of rendering assistance to vessels cast ashore by stress of weather. Congress at that session made an appropriation of $10,000 "for providing surf-boats, rockets, carronades, and other necessary apparatus for the better preservation of life and property from shipwreck on the coast lying between Sandy Hook and Little Egg Harbor," and in subsequent years it extended the stations and equipment to other States, and doubled the first appropriation. But it must be said that during the twenty-two years intervening between the beginning of the Life Saving Service and the commencement of the fiscal year of 1871, comparatively little had been expended in its support, yet the instances are rare in which so small an expenditure was productive of so vast an amount of good. Although no official record of disasters was kept prior to the appointment of Superintendents in 1855, and the reports made to the Department since have not been regular or complete, it is certain that 4,163 lives were rescued, and that $716,000 worth of property was saved through the instrumentality of this service. There is reason to believe that these figures would be largely increased if accurate statistics could be obtained. The total amount of money expended in the support of the service is less than $280,000.

The occurrence of several fatal disasters in the winter of 1870-71 made it apparent that the service was not in the effective condition that it should be, and Congress, by act approved April 20, 1871, made an appropriation of $200,000, for the purpose of increasing its efficiency, to be expended in accordance with the provisions of the act of December 14, 1854, and authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to employ crews of experienced surfmen at such stations and for such periods as he might deem necessary and proper.

With a view of ascertaining the actual state of affairs, the Department availed itself of the experience of an officer, and directed him to visit both coasts, and carefully examine every station and report its condition, as well as the condition of the service generally.

The duty was thoroughly performed, and the report of the officer was transmitted to the Senate in response to a resolution of that body, January 22, 1872. He found that most of the stations were too remote from each other; that the houses were dilapidated and needed repairs and enlargement. There was evidence also of neglect and misuse. The apparatus was rusty for want of care, and some of it ruined by the depredations of vermin and malicious persons. Many of the most necessary articles were wanting, and at no station was the outfit complete. At some of the stations where crews were employed in the winter months, such indispensable articles as powder, rockets, shot lines, shovels, &c., were not to be found. At other stations not a portable article was left. Some of the keepers were too old for active service, others lived too far from their stations, and few of them were really competent for their positions. Politics had had more influence in their appointment than qualification for the duties required of them. Even in the selection of crews for the stations where they were employed, fitness was a secondary consideration. The employment of paid crews at alternate stations had provided crews where they were comparatively little needed, while it had left others, where regular crews were most necessary, to rely upon such aid as might be volunteered. It had also excited discontent among those who had habitually volunteered their services at the intervening stations, and a feeling that an unjust discrimination was made against them.

On the receipt of the officer's report, the proper measures were taken to remedy the defects of the service; and to place it upon a better footing. Inefficient officers were removed and suitable persons appointed in their places. Instructions were given that the strictest regard should be had to experience and qualification as surfmen in the selection of crews, and that proper care should be taken of the houses and apparatus. Specific directions were forwarded to the Superintendent for the keeping of suitable records and making reports to the Departments, and a journal was furnished the keeper of every station in which he was required to make entries of all pertinent facts. Steps were also taken to effect a thorough re-organization of the service, and to prepare a suitable set of regulations for its government.

During the fall of 1871, thirteen new houses were erected on the New Jersey coast; six on the Long Island coast; the old houses on that coast, east of Fire Island, having been already repaired and enlarged, and the erection of several new houses contracted for.

In 1872, there were 30 Life Saving Stations on the coast of Long Island, and 40 on the coast of New Jersey; 9 on Cape Cod; 1 on Black Island; and 1 on Narragansett Pier;—81 stations in all. And the following shows the service rendered:

SUMMARY.

Number of wrecks	22
Value of vessels wrecked	$227,300
Value of cargoes (as far as reported)	$21,800
Amount of property saved	$289,756
Amount of property lost	$208,344
Number of lives saved	206

In 1873, the Life Saving Service comprised eighty-one stations, which are located upon the coasts of Cape Cod, Rhode Island, Long Island and New Jersey, and are divided into three districts—the coast of Cape Cod, from Race Point to Monomoy, forming the first; the coasts of Rhode Island and Long Island, from Narragansett pier to Coney Island, the second; and the coast of New Jersey from Sandy Hook to Cape May the third.

The number of wrecks which have occurred since the last report, upon coasts where stations were in operation, as shown by the wreck reports of the keepers of stations, is as follows:

No. 1	9
No. 2	10
No. 3	13
Total number of wrecks	32
No. of lives imperilled	235
No. of lives saved	234
No. of lives lost	1
No. of shipwrecked persons sheltered in station-houses	33
No. of days' shelter afforded	77
Property imperilled	$832,230
Property saved	581,211
Property lost	226,029

The cost of maintaining the service during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1873, exclusive of the amount expended in the construction and establishment of new stations, was $87,893.83.

Congress also appropriated $100,000 "for the establishment of new life-saving stations upon the coast of the United States," and contracts were made for the construction of twenty-one new stations, at the following points:

On the coast of Maine:

West Quoddy Head, (near Carrying Point Cove.)

Cross Island, (Machias Bay.)

Browney's Island (near Jonesport.)

Whitehead Island, (Penobscot Bay.)

The Pool, (Saco Bay.)

On the coast of New Hampshire:

Rye Beach (near Straw's Point.)

On the coast of Massachusetts:

Plum Island, (Sandy Beach.)

Davis' Neck, (Ipswich Bay.)

Gurnett Point, (near light-house.)

Under the Act of March 3, 1873, which appropriated $30,000 for the purpose, the Storm Signal system of the Signal Service has been connected with the Life Saving Service at several of the stations on the New Jersey coast, and through it, the Treasury Department is placed in direct telegraphic communication with the stations at Sandy Hook, Monmouth Beach, Squan, Barnegat, Atlantic City, Peck's Beach and Cape May; and the system will be extended to the stations on the North Carolina coast.

In order still further to increase the efficiency of the Life Saving Service, regulations for the government of the service, based upon the several acts of Congress relating to the subject, were promulgated, which effected a complete organization of the service, and which, with such changes as its growth will compel, it is believed, will be adequate to its proper and efficient government. They divide the stations into convenient districts, each to be cared for by a superintendent, and provide for an appropriate supervision of them all by an inspector. They specify the duties of each person connected with the service, and provide for the proper care of all the stations and their appurtenances. They include a simple, but ample code of signals, devised by the inspector, for intercommunication between the stations; instructions and drill in the use of the apparatus; hints as to the management of boats; instructions for saving drowning persons by swimming to their relief, and directions for restoring the apparently drowned.

The last report of the Life Saving Service embraces the fiscal year of 1874, and shows that twenty-two new stations were established, as follows: Five on the coast of Maine, one on the coast of New Hampshire, five on the coast of Massachusetts, one on the coast of Rhode Island, three on the coast of Virginia, and seven on the coast of North Carolina. They are completely equipped and manned. Contract has been entered into for the construction of six stations on the coast of Maryland and Virginia, between Cape Henlopen and Cape Charles, under authority of the act of June 20, 1874, and arrangements will be made for the erection of two other stations between these capes, on the coast of Delaware, as soon as possession of the sites selected for them, which are the property of the State, can be obtained. The act of June 23, 1874, appropriated the sum of $342,304.44 to carry out the act above cited.

When these stations are completed and put in operation, the Atlantic coast, from Quoddy Head to Cape Hatteras, with the exception, perhaps, of the vicinity of Point Judith, will be well protected. South of Cape Hatteras nothing is needed, except the houses of refuge provided for by the act above referred to.

The one hundred and four stations located in the five districts, designated as the Maine district, the Cape Cod district, Rhode Island and Long Island district, the New Jersey district, and the Virginia and North Carolina district, embrace the most dangerous portions of the Atlantic Coast. From the reports of the Superintendents it appears that during the season of 1873-4 forty-eight vessels, valued, with their cargoes, at $2,331,606, and having on board 1,106 persons, were driven on these shores. In twenty-nine instances the life-saving apparatus was called into requisition, and 303 persons were rescued by it. Of the amount of property jeopardized only $457,282 was lost, and the number of lives lost was but two. Both of these were caused by the falling of the mast of a vessel when she struck—a case in which, of course, life saving appliances were not available. The number of days' shelter afforded shipwrecked persons at the stations was 494.

The Life Saving Service had been in operation under the present system three years on the coasts of Long Island and New Jersey and two years on the coast of Cape Cod. The statistics of disasters upon these coasts during that time are reported as follows:

Wrecks.....	102
Lives imperilled.....	1,607
Lives saved.....	1,604
Lives lost.....	3
Shipwrecked persons sheltered and succored at stations.....	149
Days' shelter afforded.....	571
Property imperilled.....	$3,685,936
Property saved.....	2,758,281
Property lost..	927,655

Almost all the disasters which occur upon these coasts are from the stranding of vessels, and it is against death and loss of property resulting from this class of disasters that the Life Saving Service, as thereon established, is designed to afford protection. The success of the system, which the foregoing statistics imply, is all that can be hoped for. It is hardly to be expected that an equal measure of success will be attained upon the lakes, where the causes and character of a large proportion of the disasters are of a different nature. That the benefits to be derived from the extension of the service there, however, will amply justify the expense involved, cannot be doubted.

Reports and statistics of shipping disasters are required to be collected under the provisions of the act of June 20, 1874; and certain statistics have been gathered. The following is a summary of wrecks and disasters which show a sad loss of human life:

Summary of wrecks and casualties on and near the coasts and on the rivers of the United States, &c:

With the proof thus presented of the necessity and the efficiency of the Life Saving Service, its gradual extension will be justified to all parts of the dangerous coasts of the United States frequented by vessels either domestic or foreign. The appropriations of a Republican Congress infused life and vigor into a service which had been allowed to languish for lack of sympathy, and to become almost useless from incompetent men, insufficient equipment, and decaying station houses. Its present condition is an evidence that the Republican party fully realizes the wants, in this respect, of a great maritime nation, and desires to supply them conscientiously. Our Life Saving Service is superior to that of any other country, because no foreign service receives assistance from the government. Even the Royal National Life Boat Institution of England is a private association, called into existence by the bounty of the benevolent. As a private institution, it has rendered great service; but its subscription list must needs be limited; which, limiting the number of stations, must leave many points on the dangerous British coast altogether unprotected. It cannot, therefore, compare in effectiveness with our Life Saving Service, whose numerous stations dot the coasts of the United States, and whose men are ever on the watch, day and night, to rescue unfortunates from the perils of the deep. Nor can a private institution, however grand its character and beneficent its working, when supported only by voluntary contributions—though it bask under the patronage of Royalty—compete with an institution national in its breadth, supported by the nation, and regulated with all the precision of the naval service; for there must be periods when its usefulness is crippled by the fluctuation of its means.

The aim of the Republican party has been to place this country at the head of all the nations of the earth. It has done this, to a great extent; and the United States of North America leads the van in many things which denote the enterprise and earnestness of our daily life. It has given a new career to the Life Saving Service by enabling it to respond to the national desire that aid should be rendered to shipwrecked mariners at widely distant places of danger; and property rescued from jeopardy by marine disasters. From the success achieved in the past, and the present, it is but just to the Republican party—the party comprising the best elements in the nation—that the trust reposed in it should be continued. It has left its mark upon the age, and built up the Republic in grandeur and strength; and it seems but the teaching of wisdom that the Republican party should be left to complete its plans for this important service, and plant its stations, boats and crews wherever the claims of humanity and of commerce may call for them.

THE folly and danger of leaving loaded pistols within the reach of children received a sad illustration in Cincinnati on Sunday. A respectable German of that city, who had purchased a new revolver on Saturday, left it lying, loaded, on the mantle-piece of his room. In his absence, a son, fifteen years old, possessed himself of the pistol and began snapping it—“in fun”—at a little two-year old brother. In a moment the pistol was discharged, and the bullet went crashing into the baby's forehead. The little one lived only half an hour, and the parent survives to mourn his carelessness.

It is the duty of man to provide for his family. It is no less his duty to provide good government for the community in which he lives. This he can do by doing his duty at the primary meeting and at the ballot-box. Nominate good men, and then do your best to elect them. This should be one of the highest obligations of citizenship.

THE TRUTH OF HISTORY.

The friends of Jefferson Davis are very angry because General Sherman, in his Memoirs, chooses, when giving an account of the Johnston surrender to mention his own and the general suspicion on the Union side, of the Confederate leaders being a party to the plot which terminated so tragically by the assassination of Mr. Lincoln. Southern newspapers declaim loudly against this accusation. They are wasting a large amount of fine rhetoric over what was then a very natural feeling. But Sherman is able to take care of himself in this matter. The intent of this present article is to show that while claiming to defend Mr. Davis from a false accusation, southern editors are eagerly endeavoring to do more, and seek to use it as a means of vindicating the public policy of the Confederacy, for the character of which their President must have been, and in fact was, in a very large degree, personally responsible. Just here, then, is where a natural and historical interest is developed, in what otherwise it would not be worth while noticing.

The Mobile Daily Register, is edited by a veteran in southern affairs, Mr. Forsyth, and what he says is always noteworthy. In an editorial of June 11th it quotes Sherman's account of his remarks to General Johnston, when informing him of Mr. Lincoln's assassination: "I told him I could not believe that he, or General Lee, or the officers of the Confederate army, could possibly be privy to acts of assassination; but I would not say as much for Jeff Davis, George Sanders, and men of that stripe."

The Register proceeds to argue that Sherman had no right then or now to say this; that Davis was a reluctant secessionist; that he made union speeches in the canvass of 1860; that in fact he was behind the south and not in advance. It then says:

"After he accepted it he pleaded for the laws and usages of civilized warfare when many who are now high in the regard of the Northern people, and some who have sold their birth-right for a mess of pottage, were in favor of raising the black flag and consigning all alike, guilty and innocent, women and children, to a common butchery. It was the iron hand of Jefferson Davis which held the most horrid passions in check and which preserved unsullied the banner of St. Andrew. While there are some traits of his character which we did not like, there is nothing in his career which any honorable man can stamp with opprobrium. If he erred, his errors were a love of the cause which the people had committed to his hands and an unconquerable determination to liberate his people. When Sherman attempts to degrade Mr. Davis, he attempts to degrade the whole South. We do not intend that thorns shall be placed upon the brow of the leader while flowers are being strewn upon the graves of those who chose him as a leader."

The italics are not in the original. They are placed there so as to emphasize what is claimed with what will be said herein.

Contrary to the assumptions of the Register, history will finally sum up the career of Mr. Jefferson Davis in a very different manner, more especially in this matter of "civilized warfare." One fact is noticeable in scanning the southern annals of the civil war, and that is, that such prominent politicians and officers as were noted during the continuance of hostilities for ultra language, bitter denunciations of the northern people, cruel treatment of prisoners or loud-mouthed propositions for war a-la-outrance, were in every sense the chosen friends of Jefferson Davis, in his personal and public position. Every year adds to the evidence that the men who in the Confederate Congress, sought to establish the fact that the war was one amenable to the laws and usages of civilization, were those regarded as hostile to the confederate administration.

In military affairs, Early, Hood, Bragg, Forrest, D. H. Hill, Beauregard, Hindman, and many others, notorious for brutal warfare and loud denunciation, were the favorites of their chief. The rebel archives, portions of which have been published, offer abundant proof of the direct and official sympathy of Jefferson Davis with propositions for raids on unarmed territory, like that of St. Albans; with the efforts made to organize a systematic plan of guerrilla warfare in such regions as Western Missouri, East Tennessee, Kentucky and elsewhere; with movements for enlisting Indians and exciting the hostility of the wild tribes on the plains and mountains of the central territories; and more atrocious than these, with the conspiracies hatched in Canada and Richmond to raise riots in defenceless cities, to burn hotels, to poison the water, and infect the dwellings with contagious diseases. No one has yet denied the authenticity of publications made in 1872, from the rebel archives, of the reports made by C. C. Clay jr., of Alabama, Prof. Holcombe of Virginia, and Jacob Thompson of Mississippi, in which accounts are given from Canada to the Confederate State Department, on the subjects alluded to, and others of the same general character. These papers from which the publications were made, bore the formal marks of reception by Judah P. Benjamin, their reference to Mr. Davis, and his approval of the same.

It is hardly necessary to refer to the treatment of Union prisoners at the pens of Andersonville, Salisbury, Belle Isle, Tyler, and other places. It has never been seriously controverted that General Winder, the brutal officer in charge of captured "federels," was the direct choice of Jefferson Davis for that service, or that he was steadily sustained by him in the barbarous policy so thoroughly pursued—of systematically keeping prisoners in a state of semi-starvation, so that when exchanged, if ever, they should not be in a fit condition to do more service. The endorsement of Mr. Davis can be found to reports, and other documents setting forth these ideas of "civilized warfare." Nor will it be denied that Mr. Davis was the author and promulgator of the atrocious announcement, that colored men enlisted as soldiers or sailors, in the Union forces, were not to be regarded, if captured, as prisoners of war, but were to be sent into slavery, or shot on sight, while "no quarter" was the order fulminated against the white officers, by whom they were commanded. Mr. Davis can be proven to have been cognizant or approving of the execution of such orders, notably at Fort Wagner, Fort Pillow, and on the Steele-Banks campaigns of Arkansas and Louisiana, in the early summer of 1864. In these and other movements, where colored troops were engaged, wounded men were shot in the field by Confederate soldiers, acting under general orders, emanating from Richmond, while their officers were slain when captured, or in a few instances only escaped that fate by claiming to belong to white regiments known to be in the opposing force.

Mention has been made of the early employment of Indians by the Confederacy. Albert Pike, acting under the direct orders of Davis, appeared in the Indian Territory as early as June, 1861, and as Special Confederate Commissioner, commenced the work of raising an Indian division, among the semi-civilized peoples living there. Two companies of Choctaws entered the Confederate service at Fort Smith, Arkansas, as early as the middle of July, and were engaged under Sterling Price at the battle of Wilson's Creek, or Oak Hills, Missouri, as the rebels term it, on the 10th of August, 1861. It will be remembered as the scene of Nathaniel Lyon's heroic death. Albert Pike, himself, commanded an Indian division at the battle of Pea Ridge, in March of 1862. These occurrences were long before Indians were enlisted in the Union army—which enlistments were as Home Guards to defend the territory from which Pike's Indian troops had driven them at first. At the same time Pike was engaged in compelling the Cherokees to violate their treaties, and serve unwillingly (a majority of them at least) on the Confederate side. He also directed the resistance to and pursuit of the loyal Indians, who under the Creek Chief, O-poth-le-ye-ho-lo, finally fought their way to Kansas. Long before that event occurred, however, Albert Pike, acting under the instructions of Jefferson Davis, had endeavored to incite the nomadic tribes of the central plains, (the Kiowas, Comanches, Cheyennes, etc.,) to a violation of treaty relations and the assumption of hostility towards the United States. The British have always been condemned by historians, for uncivilized warfare, in employing Indians and inciting them to hostilities against the Americans, during the war of Independence. Under the influence of Pike a council was held during the late summer of 1861, in the western portion of the Indian territory, at which representatives of the Indians, from as far north as Wyoming and Dakota, were present, and every inducement was offered to bring about an offensive alliance with the Confederacy. The Creek Chief named, and others, had sufficient influence to prevent this, but the effects of that and subsequent action was felt throughout the frontier settlements, during the entire war, in the restless hostility of the Indians, who had come to believe the whites powerless, because of intestine war. Nor was this the only action taken. Jefferson Davis commissioned a number of well-known and desperate adventurers to proceed to such territories as Colorado, Utah, Western Kansas, etc., and inaugurate a system of partisan war, enlisting Indians, breaking up mail communications and otherwise to harry the unarmed people where they were to operate. Orders and commissions were given these desperadoes, who were captured by Union forces in the early part of 1864. Of the same character was the recognition of Quantrile, Thompson, Anderson, and other Missouri guerrillas. It has not been denied that the first named, with others, received commissions from Jefferson Davis, as officers of "partisan" regiments he authorized to be formed in Missouri—Quantrile himself taking rank as Lieutenant Colonel. So much for the ideas of Jefferson Davis as to what constituted "civilized warfare." These are only a tithe of the facts that might be suggested.

His treatment of the communities and persons within the borders of the rebel States, who were not heartily in sympathy with the treason he led and directed, constitutes after all the foulest blot on his name. The cruel conscript laws were the product of Jefferson Davis's brain. There still crueller execution received his steadfast approval. It is well-known that the autocratic temper of Mr. Davis allowed no one else to shape the salient features of Confederate policy, and that his personal vanity and prejudices led him to constant and personal supervision of and interference with the execution and management of leading details.

As to the treatment of the Southern people, who were supposed to be disaffected, it is not necessary to seek any other evidence than that of public men of the South, who were in unmistakable sympathy with the rebellion.

Albert Pike, still living and practicing law in Washington, "can a tale unfold," if he chooses to, of atrocious cruelty and tyranny exercised in Arkansas, under the orders of a particular favorite of Jefferson Davis, General Hindman, shot, after the war, by some person unknown, who, it was reasonably supposed, thus took revenge for preceding cruelties. Pike published in 1863, several pages addressed to the Confederate government and to the people of the South, setting forth in detail, the atrocious tyrannies perpetrated by Hindman and denouncing them in very vigorous language. For these remonstrances, private and public, Albert Pike was driven from the Confederate service and relieved by Davis himself from all command or duty.

What was true of Arkansas was true of nearly every other Southern State. Governor Brown, of Georgia, ranged himself against the home policy of Davis, and Governor Vance, of North Carolina, was emphatic in his denunciations thereof. The following letter, addressed by Governor Vance to J. A. Seddon, then rebel Secretary of War, will show the policy of Jefferson Davis at home :

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
RALEIGH, Dec. 21, 1863.

Hon. James A. Seddon, Secretary of War :

DEAR SIR:—I desire to call your attention to an evil which is inflicting great distress upon the people of this State, and contributing largely to the public discontent. I allude to illegal seizures of property and other depredations of an outrageous character by detached bands of troops, chiefly cavalry. The department, I am sure, can have no idea of the extent and character of this evil. It is enough, in many cases, to breed a rebellion in a loyal county against the Confederacy, and has actually been the cause of much alienation of feeling in many parts of North Carolina. It is not my purpose now to give instances, and call for punishment of the offenders—that I do to their commanding officers—but I ask if some order or regulation cannot be made for the government of troops on detached service, the severe and unflinching execution of which might check this stealing, pilfering, burning, and sometimes murderous conduct. I give you my word that in North Carolina it has become a grievance, damnable and not to be borne! If God Almighty had yet in store another plague, worse than all others, which he intended to let loose on the Egyptians, in case Pharaoh still hardened his heart, I am sure it must have been a regiment or so of half-disciplined Confederate cavalry. Had they been turned loose among Pharaoh's subjects, with or without an Impressment law, he would have become so sensible of the anger of God that he never would have followed the children of Israel to the Red Sea!—no, sir, not one inch! Cannot officers be reduced to the ranks for permitting this? Cannot a few men be shot for perpetrating these outrages? Unless something can be done, I shall be compelled in some sections to call out my militia and levy actual war against them. I beg your early and earnest attention to this matter. Very respectfully yours.

(Signed,)

Z. B. VANCE.

The rebel commander of the department, which embraced North Carolina, was General D. H. Hill, who is still one of the warmest of the friends of Jefferson Davis, as well as an exceptionally vituperative assailant of all Northern views and public men.

But why extend the indictment? It could be done almost indefinitely. The facts are too recent to be forgotten, though the bitterness of the memories they evoke have so far faded as to arouse no opposition to the spirit of reconciliation, which finds lodgment in the Northern heart, and is only disturbed or veiled when, as in this case, an attempt is made to falsify history and torture the records. The object in this is plain. Its explanation is found in the general effort now making in the South to rehabilitate the old secession abstractionists and State sovereignty politicians and leaders, under whose advice that section plunged into civil war, and to put them forward as the proper representatives of a people they deceived, and over whom they ruled with cruel vigor during the period of belligerent authority.

Much is now said about the fraternization of the citizen-soldiery of both sections. No heart or brain that holds kindly feelings for its fellow-men, can fail to rejoice at the recent manifestations of this spirit. Yet, it behooves all thoughtful persons, who recognize the essential distinctions that were the animating cause of the civil war, to lose sight of no one of the principles on which the nation will be founded, if it is to remain great, progressive and undivided, as the centennial anniversaries call into recurring decades. Above all must there be more and constant watchfulness of the southern politicians. What is "bred in the bones" must "come out in the flesh," and men engaged for a generation and a half in spinning political theories as a reason for libicide and treason, are not likely to surrender their hopes, however they may change their method and curtail their ambition, because defeat came in the field of war. There is a systematic movement to bring out the old leaders, and the gallant men they once betrayed into a losing fight, are to be led into political support, by the appeal to their pride which is found in Forsyth's declaration, that thorns must not "be placed on the brow of the leader, while flowers are being strewn on the graves of those who followed."

The loyal men of the Union who were in the army or out of it, have no animosities to cherish; no revenge to serve. They were only the defenders and servants of an assailed country. To them, to-day, Jefferson Davis is utterly insignificant. He is almost forgotten. His name is a mere echo, but when he is indecently thrust before their notice, memories are stirred and in behalf of principles, there comes the necessity of truthful statement. He may represent the old South. His acute brain and eloquent tongue; his haughty temper and narrow prejudices; his sectional pride and provincial limitations of thought; his restless vanity and ornate courtesies of manner—the veneer of a bastard aristocracy—and his bitter personal animosities, as well as his inordinate self-pride, are all personal exaggerations of a prevailing type of character created by slavery and the habit of exalting it into a political system. The cruelty which so completely marked the conduct of his administration, military, civil and local, also found in him a logical and proper exponent. There is no desire on the part of the North to prevent the eulogizing of Jefferson Davis. It could not do it if it would, but when it is done so systematically as at present and in pursuance of an evidently understood design, those who know the facts of his remarkable career, do well when they recite them, not to adorn a tale, but to point the moral of continued watchfulness. The people of the South may be trusted. That is a lesson of Republicanism. But their aspiring, ambitious and faithful leaders, are to be avoided. All the North desires is "to let 'em alone."

RECONSTRUCTION AND THE REVIVAL OF INDUSTRY IN THE SOUTH.

A majority of the reports that come from the South speak more favorably of the revival of industrious efforts and interests. Northern business men, politicians and journalists, concur in the chorus which the Southern press itself has raised. This last-named fact is a proof that the break in the armor of sectional prejudice and pride has been found, and that there, as well as everywhere, in this age, it is in the region of the pocket. It has been evident to all thoughtful observers that the regeneration, so needed and desired, must be largely aided by the results of material reconstruction.

Manifold evidences of this are to be found on every hand. The letters now being published in the New-York Herald and Chicago Tribune, the one an "independent" but sensational newspaper, and the other an "independent" Republican journal, faithful to principles, critical of persons and policies, are worthy of study in this connection. Both writers have traveled in Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, Alabama and Georgia. They unite in denouncing the corruption of "carpet-bagism," though not with that keen discrimination so necessary to justice. They agree that Democrats are no more honest than the Republicans they assail; and both unite in showing that the "color-line" is still maintained, with more or less ferocity of manifestation, as there is more or less effective resistance to its spirit.

On one thing these writers agree most heartily, and that is, the good working qualities of the colored laborers, and the widespread effort that is now making to insure a crop and rebuild the waste places. It is also certain, that where Democratic success has been most marked, this spirit is most feeble and spasmodic; and that wherever, on the contrary, the ideas of Republican equity have successfully fought their way to recognition, as in Mississippi, Louisiana and South Carolina, there the greater harmony prevails between employer and employed. All this is in the line of reconstruction. It has been evident from the first, that to sustain the work of political regeneration was to maintain the results of our victory, and gather, for the prosperity of the nation, and of the States also, the harvest which can only come from the efforts of free labor. Obstacles were in the way; the old structure had to be used, rent as it was from foundation to roof; our various fortunes had to be sheltered within the gaping walls. The old temple was to be rebuilt, and the materials that were there before had to be re-used. The stone rejected by the builders — free labor — has become the cornerstone of the fair fabric, whose superb outlines begin to rise before our vision in lines of lofty grace and with proportions of fitting harmony.

The great staples appear to be flourishing. Cotton promises exceedingly well. Texas sends cheering accounts, as to increased area and promise of yield. This State has had every opportunity to do well. Escaping as it did the ravages of the civil war, and benefitting, in fact, thereby; being, as it was, the storehouse of the confederacy, Texas met reconstruction with a bolder front than other States did. A public domain of over one hundred million acres in extent, dedicated by a Republican Constitution, (framed and fought for by the men and votes of that party) to the uses of the free schools and a free homestead, has proved its most inestimable blessing. Since the surrender of the Confederate armies, Texas has added about 300,000 to its population, while as to property, the valuation, in 1870, was $159,052,542. The probability is that the present valuation is nearer two hundred millions. It has been the chosen home of a large body of ex-confederate soldiery, just as the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, with adjacent portions of Arkansas and Alabama, are being crowded by colored immigrants, who are drawn there by the better land and the fact that their race live in numbers sufficient in the main to compel fairer treatment than they secure in other States. Arkansas, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, with Tennessee, are also active and prosperous. A wider area is under cultivation.

New York World insists that this result of greater security and peace by the defeat of radicalism. But why appear, then, by all accessible state- that Republican Louisiana and Mis- are far the most prosperous of the e it selects? In fact, it seems that e completely a State has passed un- nocratic control, the less assured is perity. In proof of this, let any one the accounts that are given by such as the Charleston News and Courier of prosperous condition of South Carolina, t of the Democratic States of Georgia, rth Carolina. And progress is also herein; for the seed sown by freedom- ing up and make the desert bloom isom like a rose.

the Chicago Tribune's special corres- , "Harryth," says, under date of June 9, is worth reading. Some ex- reproduced here on the negro citi- olitical position. "Harryth" says:

Fifteenth Amendment it is that in ie defeat of 'white-lineism,' which, robed to the core, is found to be but spirit of caste, of the days of slavery. sites ruled the negro by divine right, y would rule him by virtue of their gence and wealth,'—the Democratic i that ignorance and poverty shall share in the Government to protect ves against the intelligence and having never once found lodgment in rgian mind. * * * * * re is no sentimentalism about the a Georgia politics, and not a particle ine humanitarianism; and the result scribed to nothing but a slight regard arances, and a powerful regard for otes."

ucational affairs he states, that though lic school system is still in its infancy, year there were 2,223 white and 699 schools, with 45,559 white and 39,294 children in attendance. The census shows that the whites numbered persons and the colored 545,142, or 3,784 less. The disproportion is prob- w somewhat larger than then. The keep the matter of school accommo- at a greater disparity—there being about 25 white children at each school, and 58 colored to every one organized for their accommodation. The Chicago Tribune's cor- respondent says:

"No adequate provision has yet been made for the maintenance of the school system. For the education of a population, between the ages of 6 and 18, of 218,733 whites, and 175,304 blacks, the only revenue appropri- ated is $150,000 out of the rental of the Wes- tern and Atlantic Railroad; the receipts from poll-tax which is paid by about one-third of the voting population, and receipts from show licenses, which are hardly worth reck- oning—the total net available fund for the current year being estimated at $180,000. Last year there were no schools in fourteen counties, the local authorities applying the share of the school fund assigned those coun- ties to payment of the school debt left them by the Bullock Administration. As I have already stated, the local authorities are not empowered to levy taxes for school purposes, and bills to give them such power have thrice been killed in the Democratic Legislature."

The position of labor, under the conditions which Democracy creates, are graphically described by this correspondent, who says that in a journey of several thousand miles through the plantation States he had not, except in Arkansas, seen a dozen white men at work in the fields. He declares:

"The condition of the negro in Georgia is, without modification, that of the negro in any of the cotton States—one of poverty, only a slight remove from beggary, and what, by any other class of American workmen, would be esteemed utter destitution, than which beg- gary could scarce be worse. The negro in Georgia inhabits the same wretched hovels that, in ante-war times, were the slave-quar- ters. He could then have scarce been pos- sessed of fewer rags wherewith to hide his nakedness, and he could scarce have been more hardly worked or so ill-requited for his labor. The common outcry about his idle- ness is simply the excuse that occurs to a peo- ple who are not disposed to work, and hold that to do so would reduce them to 'a level' with the negro, for the impoverished condi- tion of the country, because they (the white population), as a body, are mere idle consu- mers. The negroes work as well as men could. Not only do the men work, but the women and children as well—perhaps only because they have to."

No white laborer would live in their con- dition. The negro is a "creature of less wants than any white man in the Union." The towns in Georgia are filled by idle white persons who live by renting land on shares to the negroes, as in former days they lived by hiring out their bodies. Industry is still condemned, and "the laborer" is "spoke about as men North would speak of the steam engine, and is regarded very much as live-stock is at the North." The white man loafs while he has land to rent, or runs for office to eke out his living. The most productive lands only are worked. The negroes are inadequate in number to the cultivation of the whole area, so only the most productive portions are selected. Between "25 and 40 per cent. of the cleared lands are waste and uncultivated." "The nigger" has nothing to gain by investing his labor in the improvement of subsequent crops." In Georgia, as elsewhere, the "question of labor" is what troubles. Says the correspondent:

"It has not occurred to these planters that the important move toward the solution of this vexed question would be made when they taught their sons to work. But the fathers still cherish the hope of continuing as the landed aristocracy. The sons are crowded into the over-crowded professions, or into 'business,' and aspire to be 'planters,' as were the fathers. And in Georgia (for that matter throughout the cotton country), a planter is a man who never himself works, and expects to grow rich off the work of the 'niggers.'"

Still there is little doubt but that there is more effort, generally, in the South this year. It is the effort born, in part, of a distinct realization by many land owners and employers that there is a better way to prosperity than the "color-line" indicates, and a surer one than that of bitter political wrangling. The negro is working better wherever he is treated better: The testimony is general that laborers are "working well, and everything looks remarkably promising." And this testimony is far more emphatic in the States where Republican influence is most distinctly felt. It is feeblest where, as in Georgia, the Democratic "abstractionists" find their chief occupation and success in solving the problem of how to control labor, and make all men vote their ticket.

GOVERNOR DAVIS, of Minnesota, informs the Republican State Central Committee that he will not be a candidate for re-election, and his name will not be presented to the convention.

REBELS IN OFFICE.—With every disposition to see the breach healed between the North and the South, it can only be accomplished on the principle of loyalty to the Union. It is, therefore, with feelings akin to disgust, that we read such a record as the following, which unfortunately is a true representation of affairs in certain localities:

"Whenever we object to the election of rebels to the principal offices of the country we are charged with a desire to 'perpetuate the enmities which grew out of the war. Is it only on condition that we will give them all the offices, that the rebels consent to be friends to our Government? If not, why raise such a silly excuse for giving the public interests into the hands of public enemies?'"

The wealth and other substantial advantages conferred upon the South by the reconstruction measures of the Republican party, and the advantages yet in prospect, are too great to be hazarded by regarding any such sentiment as the above. The enmities which grew out of the war, were caused by the men who commenced the war. Until the opinions and habits engendered by the peculiar institution have ceased to exist, and men of acknowledged loyalty guide the affairs of the South, there cannot be peace. The least that can be expected is the subsidence of those who adhere to the old regime, while others, who have accepted the situation, are working for the common good. A time will come, and it is not far distant, when the loyal and true shall be recognized as alone worthy of public confidence; and the men who act the part of public enemies shall be passed by. The latter are the friends of the Democratic party, and are doing their worst to prolong the opposition to the creation of a healthful public sentiment. It may be remarked that the Republican party, in the execution of the trust reposed in it by the Nation, will do its utmost to protect Southern interests, and keep them out of the hands of men who have betrayed them, and who will betray them again, if they have the opportunity. And the same may be said of national interests, and of the occupants of public offices; they must not be enemies, but tried and approved friends of the people at large.

REPUBLICAN RECRUITS.

Some of the newspapers in the South are taking a wide range of subjects, and looking abroad upon the world, they have discovered that there is ample room for the efforts of all disposed to work in the right direction. The Norfolk Day-Book urges many suggestions in regard to the duties of the leaders of the Republican party in Virginia. Among others, and with a view to recruit our strength, that journal says: "Let us seek recruits from the only source at our command, the whites; and in order to do this, we must show them that the road to promotion is open to them in our ranks. There are thousands of the best whites in the South constrained from entering our party because the line of promotion is barred against them. Let us unbar it and invite them to enter. Without them we can have no success, and the positions, one after another, are passing from our control. What say you, fellow-Republicans?"

We believe that there are many good and earnest men in the South who deplore the existing contentions, and who are anxious to do all in their power to bring about a better state of things. They realize the vast benefits which have already accrued from the reconstruction measures; and they heartily desire the ascendancy of the Republican party, that those measures may have full scope to accomplish the good designed. These men appreciate the new condition of affairs, recognize the blessings of free labor, and, on principle, regard the colored citizen as entitled to the rights and privileges secured to him under the Constitution. If they took part in the rebellion, they have accepted the situation; or, if they are citizens who have gone to the South from other States, their lot is cast there, and they wish to see the South prosperous and happy.

Citizens of this character cannot help being in sympathy with Republican principles and Republican effort. Moreover, they know that no other principles are suited to restore the South. The Democratic party is responsible for secession, and for the war which followed it. The rebel leaders, the deceived by that party, still look to it and consider it as their natural ally. That party is, therefore, incapacitated by the eternal fitness of things to build up what it was willing should be destroyed. And did the men who influenced opinion in the South comprehend their duty, they could not fail to remark how unfitted the Democratic party is to help them.

The Republican party being the only party that can lift the South into the position it should occupy in the Union, and which has conferred blessings and benefits unknown to that people before, desires to have them cut loose from the past and rise to a higher plane of civilization. The Republican party opens its arms in welcome to all men who are willing to combine for the purpose of preventing the Democratic party from continuing to disturb and injure the South. The poor whites by education and elevation, have escaped the trammels of that party which oppressed while it used them. Others, either native or emigrant, understand that the aim of the Republican party is the welfare of the country, and of the South, as a part of it. It does not matter much what has been the hindrance in former times; if they will now keep step with the party, it will rejoice. There is a great deal for them to do, and a height to which they can rise by joining our ranks. Union is strength; and in the union of such men with us, no barrier can prevent their reaching the object of their ambition. There is no element existing in the South which can interfere with their progress, either socially or politically. Let it be understood everywhere that the Republican party invites co-operation; and all who feel disposed to labor for a common object will share in the common welfare.

THE city of New York has entered suit against the "Ring Thieves"—Tweed & Co.—for more than $7,000,000. This represents only a fraction of the plunder stolen from the city by these Democratic leaders. Democracy has nearly reduced the city of New York to bankruptcy. Its debt now amounts to about $160,000. This is the party that seeks to control the nation.

INDEPENDENT TICKETS—POLITICAL MORALITY.

It speaks well for the intelligence and well-being of the country that there are men whose political morality is of a high order, and who labor diligently to erect and maintain a purer standard. As a class, they are conscientious and bold, not afraid to avow their opinions, and determined, above all things, not to tamper with their principles. They are, for the most part, reformers who seek to elevate the public, and in the direction of their hope, they may have conferred upon the people a great benefit, both from their precepts and example. Thus the advocates of temperance have done much good. They have rescued many from the influence of strong drink; they have sought out those who were about to fall and taken them by the hand; and they have strengthened weaker minds when fainting by the way and ready to yield to temptation.

All honor to the temperance cause, and to the good and kindly men who uphold it. But all philanthropists have to guard against an excess of zeal, which may tend to weaken by exaggeration and defeat for the want of forces which might be attracted to their side. Doubtless a large amount of crime is attributable to drink, and certainly a large amount of domestic unhappiness; but that the sorrows and crimes of humanity are to be traced alone to drink, is not established as a fact. And this brings us to the point. Granting that there is widespread suffering and evil in society, which may be reached and lessened by human effort, where, in all the history of politics, has there been a party with principles so fully in accord with the best sentiment of the age, as the Republican party? It cannot be denied that those principles have brought into the party the best men in the country—the wisest, the most philanthropic, the most desirous of doing good in their generation. If this be true of the Republican party, is it not the friend of the temperance cause? Can temperance men look to any other party to aid them? Will the Democracy? The Democratic party is too deeply allied to the vices of men to sanction a temperance reformation, or even to tolerate the men whose devotion would produce it. And the third party of Independents, discontented and at variance among themselves, are too feeble to render help.

Now, this is precisely the condition of affairs with the temperance men, good and true men in a good sense; and yet they have nominated a third ticket in the State of Ohio to run against the Republican candidates in the field. Does this manifest a zeal accorded to knowledge? Is it the zeal of wisdom—the zeal of common sense? True philanthropy is not transcendental. It has to deal with the rough and rugged realities of life; and in such dealing it cannot succeed without outside help. The third resolution of the temperance platform makes the matter quite clear: "We invite all persons, whether total abstainers or not, who recognize the terrible injuries inflicted by the liquor traffic, to unite with us for its overthrow, and to secure thereby peace, order and the protection of persons and property." To secure peace, order, and the protection of persons and property, is a noble aim, but it is the distinct aim of the Republican party; and when the country shall obtain so great a blessing it will be found to be the work of Republicans. The Republican party is organizing to elect in Ohio a Republican Governor next fall, and a Republican President in 1876. What does wisdom suggest? Though temperance is a virtue—an ennobling one—temperance men know that as a party they cannot stand alone; that whenever they attempt it, they are sure of defeat; and they know that while their defeat has been assured, they have endangered the success of Republicans in consequence of the votes which would have been cast for them being practically thrown away in a cause, however estimable, that was predestined in its doom.

In this campaign, the issues of which are acknowledged to be so important, let the temperance men combine their strength with that of Republicans and work shoulder to shoulder to rescue the State of Ohio from Democratic rule. With all the divisions of Republicans healed; with a hearty frankness of mind that will show that bygones are bygones, and that the men of Ohio are determined that the Republican party shall triumph, the State will be safe. This is all that will be needed. And the sorry exhibition of the Democrats of Ohio pretending to represent the men of worth and intelligence, but who were unfortunately permitted to represent them through Republican neglect, will be wiped out, and their place supplied by citizens who believe in public honor and honesty, and whose integrity will restore the State to its true position, with Governor Hayes at its head.

ORGANIZE FOR VICTORY.—We shall have talking enough during the political campaign which is about opening. Fine speeches, strong in argument, and powerful in rhetoric, will be delivered from the platform and stump. The charges of our opponents will be met, and refuted by an array of facts. The record of the Republican party will be spread before the people. Intelligent listeners will be convinced that a sense of duty to society, loyalty to the Union, and personal obligation to the cause of civilization and humanity calls upon them to adhere to the Republican party. This will be the province of speech making. The field is a broad and inviting one, and earnest laborers will be found to work therein.

But talking, alone, will not bring the victory we desire; organization, thorough and intelligent organization will. To establish this should be the object of every speech. Republican clubs should be started in every village and town in the country. They should be made attractive; both young and old should be invited to take part; frequent meetings should be held; prominent men should be invited to address them; in a word, they should be so organized and conducted as to weld together the loyal element of the community.

Unity of purpose and harmony of action should characterize these clubs. The preservation of the government and its control by those who have shown devotion to its interests, should be the bonds to unite the members. Local disputes should be avoided, and all discussions on local issues, tending to divide the party, should be carefully excluded. The work in hand—the all important work—is to keep Democracy from gaining the control of the government. Intelligent Republicans, and thoughtful citizens, know what Democratic control means. Our opponents will try to divide our strength by encouraging the formation of third parties. Any movement in that direction should be frowned down as a device of the enemy.

Having formed these clubs, and got them in working order, a system of canvassing should be adopted, so that every voter inclined to support the Republican party shall be known, and relied upon, when the day of election comes.

Last fall a number of Congressional Districts were lost by a few votes while hundreds of sound ones remained uncast. This must be avoided next fall. Every willing vote must be cast, and the only way to secure them is, to have the canvass so thorough, and the work so complete, that it will be impossible for apathy to again defeat us.

The Republican party has the numerical strength to hold the government by a large majority. It remains with Republicans to say whether the strength shall be brought to bear to save the nation from a great calamity. If our friends throughout the country will go to work, as if on a single vote depended the issue, we shall win a victory that will send a thrill of joy around the world.

ACCORDING to Ex-Secretary McCulloch, the actual debt, adjusted and not adjusted, at the close of the war (1865), or rather at the disbanding of the Federal army, was not less than $3,000,000,000. On the 1st of March last, it was $2,187,315,989, the reduction in nine and a half years having been $862,684,011, or at the rate of over $90,000,000 per annum. Nothing like this, and nothing at all comparable to it, illustrates the financial history of any other nation. What better proof could be offered of the fidelity of the Republican party to the financial responsibilities which have been placed upon it, than this exhibit of what it has done to reduce the public debt. It should be borne in mind that this great reduction has been made in the face of a continued policy of reduced taxation.

THE FALL ELECTIONS.

The accompanying tables will enable the reader to perceive at a glance the changes made, by the latest votes polled in the States that are to vote during the present year, over that of the total vote cast in 1872—the year of the last Presidential Election.

In the States wherein elections were held in 1874, Iowa and Ohio voted on State tickets for Secretary of State, and Kentucky for Clerk of Court of Appeals; Maryland for Congressmen, North Carolina for Superintendent of Public Instruction, Pennsylvania for Lieutenant Governor, and Minnesota for Chief Justice. Maine, Kansas, New York and New Jersey voted on full State tickets.

It will be noticed in Table I. that there are great changes in Maryland and Kentucky, between the majorities of 1872 and those of 1874. This change is in the main due to a large degree of dissatisfaction existing in 1872, among Democrats therein, at the nomination of Mr. Greeley.

It is easy to understand the cause of some changes at the last election, which may appear surprising without a knowledge of the situation in the several States. Take Massachusetts for instance. Governor Gaston's election was undoubtedly due to the activity of the liquor interest in his behalf, as well as to the fact that he was probably the most unobjectionable and popular man of his party in that State. He was sent to the Executive chair, handicapped by a Republican Lieutenant Governor, Council and Legislature. In New York, many causes tended to bring about the change, which resulted in placing that State in the hands of the Democracy,—temporarily it is hoped and believed. The scandalous stories, as well as the prejudices aroused by the absurd "third term" and "Cæserism" follies, had direct effect, but the chief cause was in the abstention from the polls of at least 45,000 Republican votes, and the presence of a Temperance ticket which polled 11,762 votes, nearly all of which would otherwise have been cast for the Republican nominee.

The votes of Ohio in the years indicated, show conclusively that the result in 1874 was not obtained by Democratic gains, for their total fell over four thousand behind what the party cast in 1872, but by reason of Republican lukewarmness, dissatisfaction and abstentions, and that too, in face of the fact that a good proportion of the German American votes was believed to be cast for the Democratic nominee, besides the throwing away of 2,045 votes on a temperance candidate. The Republican vote of '74 is 60,646 less than in '72. The Democratic vote is 5,907 less, deducting the temperance vote. The total direct decrease of the Ohio opposition vote in 1874, compared with the same vote in 1872 was 3,862. So it is evident that a total of 64,518 votes did not go to the polls at all last year. The vote for Governor in 1873 affords some instructive lessons. William Allen was elected by the minimum Democratic vote cast in six years. The Republican vote was also its minimum for the same period. Thurman ran for Governor in 1867, and was defeated, receiving 26,000 more than his uncle, the present Executive. The maximum vote of both parties during the period named was cast in 1872. The Democrats ran from 214,654 up to 244,321. The Republicans have ranged from 213,837 to 281,852—a difference of 68,015 for them and of 29,667 in the opposite party. These figures show the reserves of both parties and are very encouraging to Republicans. A full vote will elect Hayes by at least 30,000 majority.

In Pennsylvania, the decrease of the Republican vote last year, as compared with '72, was 77,073. The increase of the Democratic vote was 65,154. The decrease of the total vote was but 7,270. There was a temperance vote of 4,549, which will probably be cast at the coming election in the same direction.

It will be seen by further examination of the following tables, that the defeats of last year were not the result of Democratic gains, but of Republican abstentions. The total decrease in twelve of the fourteen States that vote on State tickets during the present year amounts to 360,763 votes; the increase in the same States of the opposition votes being 275,629, leaving an excess of 85,934 stay-at-home Republicans. The excess is really greater, for when the increased vote in Maryland and Kentucky, 14,537, is added it will be over 100,000, or nearly two-fifths more than the total opposition vote.

i Kansas shows an opposition vote—for Democratic Reform candidate, 35,301; Independent and scattering votes, 2,398; Republican majority over regular opposition, 13,293.

ii Massachusetts elected a Democratic Governor and a Republican Legislature, &c. Gaston's vote was 96,376; scattering, 270, making Governor's majority over all, 6,862; over regular Republican nominee, 7,032

iii In New York 11,768 temperance votes were cast for Governor. Tilden's majority over all was 38,549; over Dix, 50 317. United opposition majority, as in the table.

iv Ohio gave 2,045 temperance votes Democratic majority over all was 17,202; united opposition to Republicans, as above v Pennsylvania gave 4,649 temperance votes. The opposition over all is as above. The Democratic majority was 5,679, a decrease on the vote of 1872.
‡ The vote of Texas indicates for 1873 both a Republican and Democratic gain over that of the preceding year. The total vote was increased 38,331.

(d) To indicate the decrease of total vote in Democratic States.

The aspects of the present campaign are, at this outlook, quite encouraging. This feeling is attributable to the heartiness with which Republicans everywhere are entering on the heavy work of reorganization, which is upon and before them. Every one seems determined to do their best. More than all else, there is a full realization of the greatness of the stakes at issue, and a wise determination is manifested to deserve victory by endeavoring to win it. The figures given in the foregoing tables are conclusive as to the ability of the Republican party to again march to the van of political progress and triumph.

is looked upon with the greatest interest. The Democracy are encumbered with Bourbonism of the worst character. Open coquetry with the organized hostility to the public school system, which is expressed by the Romish hierarchy, has aroused a vigorous distrust and active fear that is sure to be felt at the polls in October. There is also a fierce family quarrel going on in their own camp. Out of the State, the leading Democratic press denounces the "Confederacy-currency" planks of their platform with almost bitter unanimity ; while inside the State its adoption is well understood to be a piece of shrewd strategy on the part of Mr. Pendleton's friends, whereby it is hoped to push Allen overboard and destroy Thurman's usefulness, removing both from the path of Pendleton's Presidential aspirations. Its results will be to wreck all their illusions. In the meanwhile the Republicans are heartily and unitedly at work. The Germans are returning to the standard, and the leaders of the "Liberal" and "Revenue Reform" agitations—they cannot be termed parties—are openly accepting and working for the Republican nominees. There is work to be done, and a great deal of it. The best evidence of its prospective accomplishment is the spirit in which all parties are entering the lists.

PENNSYLVANIA

is considered secure for Gov. Hartranft's reelection, by hard work and vigorous exertions. The opposition are building on disaffection among the miners in the anthracite region. The best information that comes to hand shows very little ground for this hope, as the larger portion of the Republican vote therein is located in the Lackawana basin, among the Welsh miners, who have been but little affected by the strike and the movements of the State authorities consequent thereon, and who, moreover, are not in the habit of changing settled convictions because of local disorders growing out of conditions not affected by the present policies of the great parties now in existence. The Welsh miners throughout the coal region, and the major portion of the American voters will, as heretofore, vote the Republican ticket. As to the Irish-Americans therein, it is a well known fact that the Democratic hold on them is greatly weakened, and whatever may be the probable changes pending in their ranks, they are not likely to result to the advantage of that portion of the opposition. Elsewhere in Pennsylvania, as there, Republican prospects are fair and improving. The apparently large increase last year of the Democratic vote is due to their dissatisfaction in 1872, with the nomination of Horace Greeley.

MASSACHUSETTS AND MAINE

will both be as they were in 1872. There can be no doubt but that the Republicans will this year elect their Governor in the Bay State. The party will go to the polls without the internal dissensions which have recently seriously affected its morale. The friends of Gen. Butler and Judge Hoar, as well as those gentlemen themselves, will be found united in the State Convention, and before the people. The prohibitionists themselves are content to let the new license law have a fair trial, and there is no probability of any Labor Reform movement. So the issue will be clear. Popular as Gov. Gaston is, of the result there can be no doubt. Of Maine, no fears have been entertained. Gen. Conner, the Republican nominee for Governor, is a young, brilliant and gallant gentleman, of decided ability and great popularity.

MINNESOTA

Republicans have closed their ranks again, and disputes over nominations are not likely to be serious in character. This, with the general revival of earnest effort, ensures a victory in the northwest.

IOWA AND KANSAS

are both sure for the party of national advancement. In the first named State, Gov. Kirkwood's name will rouse the old-time enthusiasm, and the State will give nearly or quite its Presidential majority for that well-tried Republican. In Kansas no fears are entertained, the only effort needed being to get out a full vote.

CALIFORNIA

presents an interesting situation. Under old and time-tried leaders, the Republicans have put an excellent ticket in the field, on a platform which must command the support of the producing classes of that great State. Its declarations on the railroad question are in accordance with an unbroken line of decisions rendered by our highest tribunal—the United States Supreme Court, from Chief Justice Marshall down to the present day. Its declaration of the right of the State to exercise legislative supervision over corporations itself has created, is not in antagonism to threaten larger declaration relating to national right of control over commerce by land and sea.

In no way impinging upon property rights, or unduly seeking to control the business of the great corporations, the Republican party in effect, declares them to be public trusts, whose right administration is essential to the well-being of the whole community, and that therefore they are subject to the organized sovereignty and must submit to lawful regulations and supervision. The Republican ticket harmonizes with these declarations. That fact is evident from the hostility exhibited towards the ticket by the railroad magnates.

Two other tickets are in the field—one known as Independent, and the other being the regular Democratic nomination. The convention that put the latter before the people seems to have been a tame affair, and the platform consists of even more than ordinarily dull platitudes. The Independent nominees are in remarkable contrast to the wordy declarations of their long-winded and motley platform. Its "whereas" and "resolutions" would have done credit to social science, sanitary, cheap transportation, and municipal and labor reform associations, with a touch of the "Commune," but there is scarcely a grain of sound political sense through the whole. Only one utterance commends itself, and that was the declaration that the issues being local and circumscribed, are not to be regarded as controlling action on national politics. One has to thank these wiseacres for nothing after all, as it appears that this declaration was made as a dodge and was not intended as a verity.

The value of all such platforms as that of the California "Independents," is most correctly tested by the candidates they put forward. Their nominee for Governor is the Hon. John Bidwell, formerly Representative in Congress. He sought a nomination from the Republicans and failed. Mr. Bidwell is a champion land monopolist in the Golden State. He is a farmer, as are the Dukes of Sutherland, Argyle, or Bedford, who disposses the people of whole counties to make sheep farms and deer parks. His rancho is founded on a Spanish grant, the area of which is that of a small principality. In Congress he was a foremost defender of "land grabbing," and succeeded in carrying through the notorious "Soscol Rancho" job, by which some hundreds of families were dispossessed and their improvements added to the swollen list of his plethoric possessions. Mr. Bidwell has been a vigorous organizer and supporter of the Chinese labor system, by which Mongolians are practically brought to California as "peons" or debt-laborers. Ranchmen, like Bidwell, who don't want to divide their lands by selling out to small farmers, have encouraged such odious results in order to have dependent labor at their will, instead of welcoming the growth of a yeomanry that will themselves cultivate the land they purchase by their own toil. Mr. Bidwell represents in California the same class of men, who in the South desire to supplement slavery by civic serfdom, and believe the highest good to them is obtained through controlling labor."

The nominee for Lieutenant-Governor, Governor Pacheco, also sought a re-nomination from the Republicans and failed because it was known that he was a "rail oad man." Ex-Governor Stanford, president of the Central Pacific railroad, said, in a published interview, that his "preferences were for either Shafter or Pacheco. Both are good men, and I considered them both strong men before the people."

These nominations "point the moral and adorn the tale," taught and recited in the California Independent movement.

IN THE SOUTH

there will be much of interest developed by the fall elections. Mississippi will be an excellent opportunity for testing the sincerity of the much talked of "reconciliation" sentiment. There is an old adage which still retains lessons worthy consideration; it runs thus: "First pure, then peaceable." The "color-line" politicians are unmistakeably rampant as yet, in that State, and many well informed persons believe there will be a repetition of former outrages and intimidation. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof," and Republicans will learn more and more conclusively that the evil spirit of slavery is not quenched or laid at rest, in a few years. There will be wild and senseless outbursts of impotent anger—passion that in its mouthings recalls the Scriptural eunuch that "lusteth" and was not satisfied—such anger as so recently foamed in polished sentences of satanic eloquence from the lips of John S. Preston, of South Carolina, who "orated" to the youth of the "Old Dominion" at the recent commencement exercises of the University of Virginia. "General" Preston declared that the men of Virginia, who had so large a part in the organization of this Government and Union, "Were grandly inspired architects. They completed an edifice dedicated to civil freedom and free conscience, whose foundation was a continent, whose boundaries were boundless seas, and whose turrets aspired to heaven to catch the light and blessing from a God of Truth."

They were the "royal priesthood;" the University is a "saintly and benignant nurse mother." Robert E. Lee is referred to as the "high priest of that hierarchy," and the present generation are praised as those who have

"renewed all that covenant by sprinkling that altar with their blood"—as men "who have hazarded" their lives in defense of truth. These patriots, so hyperbolically referred to, are held aloft as the only defenders of English constitutional liberty, while the founders of New England are derided, as coming,

"Not as refugees from unlawful persecution and tyranny, but as escaped convicts from the just penalties of a turbulent heresy and an ambitious rebellion, which sought by violence to enforce their consciences on England's law. Instead, therefore, of bringing the laws and usages growing out of the charters of English liberty, they brought only crude and shallow systems of theological, philosophical and political fictions, scarcely above the vain babblings of mediæval speculations, mingled with the poisons of licentious fanaticism, establishing upon them municipal forms of mere superficial restraint and flimsy systems of educational training, calculated to perpetuate ignorance and substitute individual craft for public virtue."

The men of New England, in the view of this lofty minded scion of slave oligarchy "could have no inborn reverence" for the great Southern lights of the Revolution and the early following decades. "The Mayflower's freight, under the laws of England, was heresy and crime." The Jamestown emigrant

"Was an English freeman, loyal to his country and his God, with England's honor in his heart and English piety in his soul, and carrying in his right hand the charters, usages and laws which were achieving the regeneration of England."

After this outburst, it is fitly added that

"Not space, or time, or the convenience of any human law, or the power of any human arm can reconcile institutions for the turbulent fanatic of Plymouth Rock and the God-fearing Christian of Jamestown. You may assign them to the closest territorial proximity, with all the forms, modes, and shows of civilization; but you can never cement them into the bonds of brotherhood."

So the brilliant orator proceeds in language lurid in its baleful eloquence to teach the lessons of sectional hatreds to young men who have not yet left the college campus. We are told, ad nauseum, of the "Tremendous warfare with its surging waves rolling wide and wasteful over a continent, frightening the trembling earth and steeping it in blood, over which fanaticism and avarice raged with demoniac fury, and patriotism shrank from the prostrate form of liberty."

The special object of all these terrific adjectives is the denunciation of the North and of the objects for which in explosive utterances "General" Preston asserts it fought.

It is clearly stated, and no Republican will deny or apologise for the fact that he so fiercely questions, and replies:

"What was the plea of the invader, the conqueror and the destroyer? Union and emancipation, integrity of territory and freedom and citizenship for our slaves, the African negro. If there be any other plea, motive, impulse, or apology, it was not declared in the open arena."

Nor is it necessary to enter any "other plea, motive, impulse or apology," and that fact is what is the matter with "General" Preston.

These quotations have been made here for the purpose of pointing out the continued existence of encouragement of the spirit alluded to in connection with Mississippi, and the possibilities that may attend the fall election there. In addition to the State and Congressional election in that State, Alabama, Texas, and North Carolina will elect delegates to Constitutional conventions which have been called therein, for the purpose of undertaking the work of "Democratic Reconstruction." The result will bear close watching.

In Kentucky the contest for Governor is closely fought, and the Republican nominee, General Harlan, is acknowledged to be winning new adherents daily. He is acknowledged to be much abler than his opponent, whose friends are now compelled to appeal not to his fitness for the position, but to that love of party which is a cardinal virtue of the Democracy. There is a large body of voters—formerly Whigs and Unionists—who are beginning to see that emancipation and enfranchisement have not hurt them or in any way injured the Union temple. Gen. Harlan is a growing favorite with them, and Republican prospects are brightening daily.

"THE BLUE AND THE GRAY:"—THE BASIS OF THE

The Memphis Daily Appeal introduces its report of the proceedings on Memorial Day with the following remarkable head-lines:—"The graves of the Federal and Confederate dead, alike decorated with wreaths and immortelles. Distinguished public men confirm the popular will that the chasm must remain closed forever. No more sectional strife or dissension. We will live and labor for the Union, its integrity and prosperity." Among the occupants of seats upon the speaker's stand, appear the names of "Ex-Præ's Jeff. Davis," Gen. N. B. Forrest, Ex-Gov. I. G. Harris, Hon. Jacob Thompson; and the report is prefaced with the following words: "The curtain is down, the lights are out, the play is over"—words, we believe, purposely chosen to represent the sentiment entertained—the play is over—THE FARCE IS DONE!

This view of ours is based upon the proceedings of the day, as reported in the Appeal—the spirit of the poetry and the prose—the poem recited, and the speech of the Confederate orator; and, that there may be no mistake or misunderstanding, we shall allow the poet and the orator to speak for themselves.

Gen. Forrest, as one of the masters of the ceremonies, bravely performed his duties, which, we presume, were of a more congenial nature than when he wore the gray, in the month of November, 1864, and sent out a rumor that he would make a raid on the same city of Memphis. The writer was there, and saw the non-combatants—old men, women and little children, preparing to flee in the opposite direction to that to be taken by Gen. Forrest. Gen. Forrest was courageous, but his humanity was so well known and appreciated that it is impossible to tell who loved him. This warrior, however, introduced a small, unsuspecting child, one Master Lee Merriwether, to recite "The Blue and the Gray"—one verse of which sounds strangely to our ears:

"Then let us gather the sacred dust
Of our warriors, tried and true,
Who bore the flag of our nation's trust,
And fell in the cause though lost, still just,
And died for me and you."

The little boy doubtless very patriotic; but he was a Confederate orator, who was identified with the Blue, an loyal citizen, whose claims recognize—because he wor represents a cause so dear the especial wonder of the how it was lost. ed. The time, however, is fast approaching when the man will arise to accomplish a duty which the world demands. The baleful fires of hate, misrepresentation and malice, engendered by the strife, are almost burned out, and from their ashes may be sifted truths for history. Our people have no cause to regret that this time is near at hand. That many wrongs and follies have been committed by both sides is doubtless true, but the men of the South who inaugurated and conducted this internecine quarrel will be shown to have been recreant or dishonored—Never! When the truth does appear, the people of the entire North will, as her soldiers do now, concede the same patriotism, the same love of constitutional liberty, to their former opponents which they claim for themselves. * * *

The right of secession, whilst not dangerous to the integrity of the Union in the abstract, became vitalized by the crusade made against the Southern institution of slavery. * * *

We of the South, who claimed and believed there was a violation of the original compact between the States, on the part of the North, asserted the right of self-government as an independent Confederacy. In the attempt to enforce that right at the point of the bayonet, we were unsuccessful simply. "The very head and front of our offending hath this extent, no more." * * *

The men who clung with more than a Spartan heroism to their cause, through defeat and disaster, who suffered every privation incident to their impoverished and isolated position, not only with a sustained cheerfulness, but with actual gaiety and abandon, and who at last yielded only to the stern logic of overwhelming numbers, are not of those who, conspiring against good government, seeking to establish the tyranny of misrule and license, cower beneath the lashings of conscience, and quake with the fear conjured up by their guilty spirits. In no sense of the word were they traitors—in every sense they were true and loyal to their States, ancestry and traditions. Whatever may be the cold definition prescribed by legal codes, all ingenuous men will agree with me that he only is a traitor who perfidiously betrays a trust or a country. It is the motive, the moral quality of the act, rather than the act itself, which stamps its nature. * * *

What son of the North, enemy though he may have been, who has stood beside the grave of a Lee, a Johnston, or a Jackson, but has felt pride in remembering they were of the same race and nationality as himself? Who that has recalled their lives but has felt within him a nobler flame of devotion to principle, a higher perception of duty, a sterner resolve to suffer, and, if need be, to die for the right? * * *

These remarks are made in no spirit of bitterness or resentment, with no intention or desire of reopening those vexed and unprofitable issues over which have rolled the red waves of war. On the contrary their only object is to vindicate the motives and memories of the men of the South, living and dead, who lost all save honor, in an irretrievable defeat. Much as we need and desire a cessation of all bitterness, and a restoration of kindly relations, we cannot afford it at the expense of self-respect; we cannot admit to our children and posterity that we were a rebellious crew of malcontents, prepared to rule or ruin. * * *

The soldiers in Blue have on many a fatal day met the men in Gray, face, to face, and looked into their eyes long enough to see depicted there manly resolution and devoted courage, but naught that savored of treachery or dishonor. The best guaranty they can offer of their sincere desire for harmony is the constancy with which they adhered to a failing cause—the heroism with which they clung to the battle-torn flag of their confederacy when all hope had fled! This sentiment, so long repressed, is at last finding voice, and with no uncertain sound proclaims that the States of the South shall have the opportunity, so long desired, of reestablishing friendly relations with those of the North—that they shall be welcomed into the noble sisterhood of the Union, not as traitorous and conquered provinces, but as equals. A few men of influence with their countrymen of the North, of enlarged views and patriotic impulses, years since realized that the so-called Union, in its then condition, was a broken circle, and that the States of the South were necessary to a full restoration of that glorious galaxy that bedecked the nation's flag in the better days of the Republic. With peculiar magnanimity, and an eye single to the glory of the whole country, they advocated universal amnesty for all past offenses, and invoked the people of both sections to bury all past differences in a common grave. Their words and acts have taken deep root in the minds of both the North and South, and bear glorious fruit in the evidences of an universal fraternization all along the line. * * *

May we not venture the assertion, then, from recent manifestations everywhere on the part of the people, both North and South, that what seemed to us the destruction of every hope in the downfall of the Confederacy, and the death of her truest and bravest sons, may yet redound to the honor and glory of our common country? If, by the pouring out of their blood they have watered the tree of liberty, and by a contemplation of their virtues have inspired in the breasts of both North and South a truer feeling of respect for each other, and greater regard for the blessings of peace under the constitutional government of our fathers, then their death has not been in vain. * * *

It tells mankind that the Republic is not a failure—that like a young giant struggling in the toils, it has shaken from its limbs all impediments, and stands forth to begin afresh the race in the lists of civilization and of progress. In that race let us not be left behind. We have much to do. In the building up of our decayed industries, in the fostering and enlargement of our commerce and manufactories, in the advancement of the arts and sciences, in the education and elevation of the masses, will be found work for every hand."

It will be observed that in all the grandiloquence poured out on this and on recent occasion, in which the South has claimed recognition of the North, on account of its present loyalty to the Union, that there is an under current of sentiment which points to the white men alone as being interested in the movement. "We but acknowledge a sentiment which has found lodgment in the hearts of six million people," said Gen. Wright. The negro race, numbering four millions, is altogether ignored, although there must be upwards of 800,000 colored men entitled to the ballot. No mention is made of their education; of the measures adopted for the peaceful exercise of their rights as citizens; no indication is given that the future, in regard to them, will be different from the past. Mysterious allusion is made to national sorrow for the Southern dead—to liberty—constitutional liberty—to confederate blood having watered the tree of liberty—have no force, unless every citizen under the Constitution of the Union is protected while discharging the duties of citizenship, and is permitted to earn an honest living for himself and family by his daily labor.

The South commits a great blunder, when it supposes the loyal North do not understand that their attempt to destroy the Union was treason of the rankest kind. The people of the North, however, are willing to bridge the bloody chasm, if the South will act justly and obey the law. Never, under the old institutions, was the condition of the South so prosperous and the avenues for wealth so many and so certain. But the war wrought a change which cannot be resisted; and until that change is recognized, is accepted in sober truth, there will always be danger and discord. If the prominent southerners really mean what they say about a reconciliation and fraternal spirit prevailing all over the Union, they have power to help it. Let them lend voice to the Constitution; and whether they regret the past or not, they may be sure that history will deal justly with the leaders of the Confederate States.

No language of ours is strong enough to express our disapprobation of the flimsy statement of the report of the Memphis Appeal. "The candles are out, the play is over"—the whole affair—strewn with flowers—the poem—the oratorical display, to draw forth the applause of the audience who understand no more, and did not go away disappointed—are sorry to see the same thought repeated in another locality in the South. A histrionic reference is made to the presence of the confederate of centennial proceedings at Bu The Richmond Dispatch says that "may be considered the head of the alienation of the North—of those opinions and sentiments at war with Southern notions and the renewal of brotherly love—the avowal of reciprocal pledges—her people and ours have a parity and potency with like democracy. These words seem to reflect a condition of mind—a mind of loyalty from which it had severed. Shall we say to the following line to be found in the same article:

"The Government has changed the dresses and decorations, and at which were employed in the old Washington; for the intermediate years have been almost entirely cast off, never we hope to be done."

Bah! there is such a thing as justice, based upon a national standard, and the people of the South know that the people of the North were disposed to take part in a farce if they desired to be kind and obedient in word and deed, when they see a manifest contradiction by the leaders of the party they never were more in earnest for the great object for which the war shall be accomplished, and will be directed their labors specifically.

The light of experience does not flicker with an uncertain radiance. They have learned many lessons—among them the eternal distinction between right and wrong has been burned into their hearts. True patriotism at this day, is of no doubtful import. It has not a double meaning—a different meaning North and South. Children in the North and South must use it in the same sense, and employ the same illustrations. The soldiers and the people who defended and loved the Union, cannot be misled upon the subject. They would not seek for the sun in the darkness of a starless midnight. Nor could they derive patriotic inspiration from the graves of Lee, Stonewall Jackson, and other officers of the Rebellion. These and others were educated by the nation to defend her. Instead of that they stabbed her in the bosom, and fought for her destruction, using the knowledge she gave them for the purpose. No! inspiration must come from those who died that the nation might live, and that the Union may be lasting and free and prosperous, the sentiments that induced the men of the South to engage in the fratricidal strife must be rendered odious and be blotted out, and a new career be entered upon, whose fruit shall be peace and justice, practical freedom and fraternity in political effort, and the equality of all men before the law. Then the bond of union will be perpetuated by the might of right; and the sentimental glory of the galaxy of States, with wrong continued, so often spoken of, will fade away like a nightmare in the health and glow of a real restoration, which shall enhance the grandeur and stability of the Great Republic.

TAXES: WHO PAYS THEM?

"We are more heavily taxed by our idleness, pride and folly, than we are taxed by Government."—Franklin

Even among intelligent men, who, on almost all other public questions are pretty well informed, there is no little misconception on the subjects of Taxes and Tariffs, the two main sources of the Federal revenues.

Omitting for the present farther reference to tariffs, the writer will endeavor to present the system of Federal taxation so that it may meet the comprehension of every intelligent reader.

The charge is often made by those who wish to misrepresent the General Government, and render the Administration unpopular, that the people are burdened and oppressed by Federal taxation. Confiding farmers and others who believe political speakers and writers are as honest as themselves, accept these statements as true, and become prejudiced against the party in power. Now, if the facts were examined and the subject of taxation presented in its true bearing upon society, those very men would be among the first to admire the simplicity and justice of the present system of Federal taxation and give it their support. But to the subject, and first—

WHAT IS A TAX, AND WHY IS IT NEEDED?

A tax is an assessment for a specific amount made upon property for a specific purpose, under Federal or State authority; or, it may be a tax on incomes or annual earnings, or a personal or poll-tax on each adult citizen.

Each State adopts its own mode of taxation, and the State tax is always distinct from the Federal tax. The State may raise its necessary revenue from a tax on real estate alone, but the usual mode is to make up the requisite amount by an assessment on personal property as well as on real estate, to which is added usually a personal or poll-tax on each male adult, of one, and sometimes two dollars per annum.

The Federal Government pursues a different policy. The main source of its revenues is the tariff on imported goods. But in extraordinary cases, of which the late rebellion affords an example, personal property and incomes are taxed to meet a specific emergency. But Internal revenue taxes are always dropped with the removal of the cause for their collection.

A revenue is required by the Federal Government to meet the demands on the United States Treasury for the annual interest on the public debt, the expenses of the army and navy, the payment of pensions, Indian, and other ordinary expenditures, the whole amounting to about $275,000,000 per annum.

State, county, and municipal taxes, over which the Federal Government exercises no control, provide revenues from which the ordinary expenditures for legislation, schools, roads, State public improvement, and other State, county or municipal expenses are paid. In recent years many of the States have allowed their ordinary public expenditures to increase much more rapidly than the increase of population and wealth. This has resulted in a corresponding increase of taxation, a condition of affairs that should always be avoided. It can now be overcome only by rigid economy in the public expenditures and submission to a pretty severe tax until the State, county and municipal indebtedness is liquidated. Other States have been scrupulously careful, and have not allowed their expenditures to exceed their revenues, except to a limited extent, to be overcome in the following year or two. These States are out of debt—some of them entirely so—and they are generally prosperous.

With these remarks on the general subject of taxes and revenues, the attention of the reader will now be directed more particularly to the present

POLICY AND SCOPE OF FEDERAL TAXATION.

The policy of the administration is to derive the largest portion of the necessary revenues from the tariff on imported goods. The estimates for the fiscal year which commenced June 30, 1875, were made on the following basis:

From customs.....	$170,000,000
From Internal revenue.....	106,000,000
From other sources.....	17,000,000

Total estimates..... $293,000,000

It is believed now, by experienced officials, judging from the improving condition of the country and the weekly increase of receipts since the estimates were made, that the internal revenue receipts for the current year will reach $120,000,000 or over. Of this, nearly $100,000,000 will be derived from spirits, beer, and tobacco in their various forms. The balance comes from the tax on patent medicines, perfumery, matches and banking capital. These are the only articles subject to a Federal tax. And as showing what the Republican party has accomplished in the way of decreasing the taxes caused by the Democratic rebellion, it may be stated that while the Internal revenue receipts, for the fiscal year just closed, amounted to $109,500,000 and those for the current year will be about the same, the internal revenues for 1866 amounted to three hundred and nine million, two hundred and twenty-six thousand, eight hundred and thirteen dollars and forty-two cents, exclusive of a direct income tax, collected during the same year, amounting to $1,947,754.12.

Keeping in view the fact that only about half a dozen different articles are now subject to a tax, it will be interesting to note briefly the sources whence the enormous tax of previous years was derived. From March, 1865, to July, 1866, during which period internal revenue taxation was at its greatest height, all manufactures of every description, with a few unimportant exceptions specially exempted, were subject to a tax. A tax was also imposed on all slaughtered cattle, sheep and swine; on the gross receipts of advertisements, lotteries, theatres, operas, circuses, &c.; of express, insurance and telegraph companies; of canals, steamboats, ships, barges, stage coaches, railroads, &c.; on dealers' sales, auction sales, and brokers' sales of merchandise, stocks, bonds, foreign exchange, gold and silver bullion and coin; on billiard tables, carriages, piano-fortes, gold watches, yachts, gold and silver plate, articles of luxury kept for use; on bank capital, circulation and deposits; on passports, legacies and successions; on dividends and additions to surplus of banks, railroad, canal, turnpike and insurance companies; on salaries of United States officers and employés; on the annual income of all persons, in excess of $600 per annum; on legal instruments, such as deeds, bonds, mortgages, &c.; on proprietary medicines, perfumeries and cosmetics; and on friction matches and playing cards. All persons engaged as auc-

facturers, lawyers, physicians, &c., were required to pay a special tax for carrying on their business, trade, or profession—in short, nearly every available source was made to contribute to the necessities of the Government.

ANNUAL RECEIPTS FROM INTERNAL REVENUE AND INCOME TAXES.

The first revenues derived from the tax on incomes were collected during the fiscal year 1862, and in the following year from the tax on property, &c. The Income tax has ceased altogether, under act of Congress, and the Internal revenue taxes have been reduced about two-thirds below their maximum in 1866. The following official tables show the net receipts for each year :

	Internal Revenue.	Direct Tax.
1862	$1,795,331.73
1863.....	$37,640,787.95	1,485,103.61

Internal revenues come from, the the following analysis of the tax for 1874 is given.
There was collected from—1873, and covered into the U. S. Treasury in the last year.

† Includes stamps on bank checks, &c., perfumery, cosmetics, patent medicines, mat-hes &c., known as proprietary stamps.

‡ Balances from articles and occupations formerly taxed, but now exempt.

The largest receipts from Internal revenue were collected in 1866; from personal income the largest collection was in 1867
From these sources combined the largest annual collection, as will be seen, was made in 1866, and amounted to $311,174,567,74.

Since July, 1866, taxes have been gradually reduced until the amount of taxes repealed now reaches an aggregate of two hundred million dollars per annum, a reduction of two-thirds of the entire tax of former years.

The internal revenue taxes, as stated, have been removed from all articles excepting spirits, beer, tobacco, patent medicines, perfumery, matches, and banking capital; and the revenues from these sources are collected mainly by stamps, which are paid for on delivery, thus materially reducing the cost of collecting the internal revenues.

The percentage cost of assessing and collecting the revenues—adhesive stamps excepted—from 1863 to 1874, inclusive, as deduced from the expenses allowed by the the Fifth Auditor, by whom the accounts of internal revenue officers are adjusted, is as follows :

Fiscal years.	Cost of assessing and collecting.
1863.....	6 per cent.
1864.....	4 per cent.
1865.....	2 4-10 per cent.
1866.....	2 2-10 per cent.
1867.....	2 3-10 per cent.
1868.....	4 4-10 per cent.
1869 ..	4 2-10 per cent.
1870.....	3 5-10 per cent.
1871.....	4 4-10 per cent.
1872.....	4 4-10 per cent.
1873.....	4 2-10 per cent.
1874.....	4 1-10 per cent.

Add to this, allowance or drawbacks, refunding taxes, cost of stamps, paper, and dies, and the expenses of the office at Washington—in all about 2 per cent. additional—and we have the total cost of collecting the internal revenue, showing an economy probably without a parallel.

WHO PAYS THE INTERNAL REVENUE TAXES ?

As there is a perpetual Democratic howl falling upon the ears of the people about the

of Federal taxation, it will be well, while we have the figures and facts before us, to ascertain who are tax-payers and who are not. If a family uses fifty boxes of matches, of ordinary size, in a year, they pay fifty cents in taxes to support the Government. If they have occasion to use a few bottles of patent medicines; or if the ladies are disposed to indulge in perfumery; or if the head of the family is well to do and keeps a bank account, in which he occasionally draws a check, these accidents may occasion an annual expenditure of fifty cents to a dollar in taxes. But this includes the entire list of articles taxed, excepting spirits, beer and tobacco in their various forms. But the latter articles are not included among the necessities of life; they are luxuries; they pay nearly the whole of the internal revenue taxes, and those who indulge in them are the tax-payers. And yet with taxes added the consumption of tobacco, spirits and beer, is annually increasing. Dealers in those articles not only add the amount of the tax to the cost of their goods, but they fix a profit same proportion as the price for the article. In other words, the rate of profit as the consumption increases. plains of the tax; it, and the slave to all. If the tax falls Democratic party then it is only because the sumers of those are perfect remedy, against Government nor then interpose an obstacle the burden they bear daily use of these wares and their taxes will ment of internal revenue therefore, wholly individual; and if he to contribute to the ment, he does it from pulsion.

DEMOCRATIC RECONSTRUCTION.

During the civil war several border states passed under Republican control. The reasons therefor are obvious and need no recapitulation. In the following years of reconstruction, eleven southern States were distinctly under Republican direction. The constitutions, under which they were again recognized as entitled to representation in Congress, were framed by conventions, the majority in each of which were of the party loyal to the Union and the national will. In the border, as well as reconstructed States, provisions were either engrafted on their old constitutions, or others were framed, as in West Virginia and Missouri, in harmony with the new order of things.

The salient points of these constitutions were, primarily, the embodiment of distinct recognitions of the freedom of all men, their equality before the law, and of the direct enunciation of the doctrine of national sovereignty as against that of State Rights.

Secondarily, or rather to secure the due administration of these equities, the new constitutions embodied provisions prohibiting the payment of rebellion and slavery bounties; of judicial sale of public lands; of free public schools; of other changes in the form of government that of basing representation on territory instead of territory, many of the former controlling or equalizing or electors. There were of the counties into similar form, with the habit of civil disobedience which long experienced in the former states to be eased and security.

There were another temporary and precise to the wisdom of the people to prevail. These were in the form of test oaths, the exclusion of certain classes from their activity or participation in the recent rebellion.

These have proved ture—the heel of our Achilles. Here the arrows of the southern Hector have penetrated. On the cry raised and disorganization induced thereby, the border States, and a majority of the reconstructed States, with the aid of organized violence, directed against the new-made citizens and their friends of the white race, have reverted back to the Democracy—the party which has been nationally and sectionally consistent only in two things—sympathy with slavery and its consequent treason, and an eager desire to get back to power at any cost and under almost any pretence.

It is worth while observing how and in what way the Democratic victories have been used in the South. In every instance the efforts have been directed towards two points: First, a direct social, political and personal control of the colored citizen, his labor and vote, and second—a reconstruction of the State constitutions. In the latter effort the aim is distinct and definite. It is to substitute evasive or delusive phraseology for that which was so directly framed and adopted, in regard to State Rights, secession and the non-payment of rebel or pro-slavery claims, to destroy the township system, evade the population basis, and break down by omissions of needed power, the efficiency of the common schools.

A pertinent example of all these things is being exhibited in Missouri—a State which has, since 1820, been the battle ground of contending systems. For more than a generation it has been ruled by those who sustained the most ultra doctrines of State sovereignty, while as a fact, its existence as a State, is due to the common purchase, settlement and effort of the entire people. Formed from the Louisiana purchase, its Democratic politicians have claimed the right of the robber, and were only foiled in 1861, by bolder men than themselves.

In 1865, northern and national influences controlled this—the Keystone State of the Continental interior—and a constitution was framed, denying State sovereignty, establishing free schools, and basing representation on population. These were chief among its principal features. The latter was essential to a redemption of the State. By the constitution of 1820, under which it was admitted, territory, not inhabitants, controlled every county being allowed at least one representative, while at the same time the total number of representatives were so limited that it was impossible for the better settled portions of the State to acquire the influences justly belonging thereto.

This system has been defended from the beginning as a Democratic principle. It has been strenuously sustained as a measure of policy and with good reasons, as it deliberately committed that great State for 45 years to the rule of a minority, and that the more ignorant, illiterate, prejudiced and intolerant of the inhabitants thereof, who are inevitably the bulk of the Democratic party.

The Bourbon Democracy unlearn nothing. Having succeeded in obtaining renewed control of the State through the ambition of German-American leaders who desired to keep their followers intact, as a balance-of-power element, and by the effect of another feeling—that of revolt against civil disabilities, which was felt by a Republican minority, more generous than wise, the Bourbons now kick in the face the men on whose shoulders they first climbed back to power, and proceed to make a constitution by which they fondly expect to ensure a long continued lease to themselves and party associates, present and prospective.

Of course the Convention is Democratic. There are fair reasons to believe that even with fair play on their own part, the Democracy might continue to control the State—at least for some years to come. The accessions to its population for some years past, appear to have been most largely drawn from Kentucky and the southern portions of Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio, as well, also, from Tennessee. These are all Democratic strongholds. Besides, a large number of the ex-Confederate soldiery belonging to Missouri, originally disbanded in Texas, have returned to their own State. This secures present success. But the two great rivers which flow through the State, bring civilization and advanced ideas on their waters. The lines of railroad, built or in process of construction, serve the same beneficent end. The advent of liberal thought and free industry, "to the manner born," is a death blow at Bourbonism.

This is understood by the Democratic majority.

The convention's delusive paraphrase of a bill of rights—so far as it deals with the relations of state and nation—need not be now discussed. Nor will it be well to digress to the avowed hostility displayed toward the system of free schools, which a Republican constitution established, and legislatures of that faith organized and sustained. To turn aside and point to the presence of Waldo P.
Johnson—a confederate politician, who is, avowedly, unreconstructed—as presiding officer, is also unnecessary. But the manner in which the People of Missouri, without regard to party, are being despoiled, in the interests of a bigoted faction, deserves and must command exposure—illustrating as it does the character of Democratic reconstruction.

The State of Missouri is now divided into 117 counties, and contained, according to the census of 1870, a population of 1,721,295.
Accepting the total increase for the preceding decade, 59,283, as the standard for the one now passing, and over a quarter of a million persons can be added to the total of 1870, making the present estimated population at not less than two million persons.
The injustice perpetrated by the Bourbon scheme of reconstruction is thus made greater, as at least seven-tenths of this increase is in the counties that are largely disfranchised.
The following is the section adopted by the Convention, the rule for representation, the vote being 42 to 17:

"The House of Representatives shall consist of members chosen every second year by the qualified voters of the several counties, and apportioned in the following manner: The ratio of representation shall be ascertained, at each session of the General Assembly, by dividing the whole number of inhabitants of the State, as ascertained by the last census of the United States, by the number 200.
Each county having one ratio, or less, shall be entitled to one Representative. Each county having two-and-a-half times said ratio shall be entitled to two Representatives.
Each county having four times said ratio shall be entitled to three Representatives.
Each county having six times said ratio shall be entitled to four Represent-on above that number, givin member for every two-and-a-ratio."

The St. Louis Republican, a able paper strongly in opposi-ministration, says of the C
tion:

A majority of the delegates a minority of the people of carried their point, which is franchisement of the popula-of the larger counties. The ratio is to be determined by whole population of the Sta-nominally so; in point of facadopted after fixing it as the sentation, proceeds to disregaing that 36 counties which the ratio shall still have one each; and, second, by directicounties that possess two or n-not have a corresponding n-representatives. It therefore givcounties more than their share legislature and doubles the ining the 24 larger counties less share.

Besides this it makes a curinjustice—by providing that two-and-a-half ratios; to be e-representatives it must have

be entitled to four represent-have six ratios; and to be ethan four representatives it n-

Waldo P. Johnson, an ex-the Union and rebel Senates, a an able man, defends this actiber plea—that the small co-the power now, propose to kewrong. It is worth while e-scheme more in detail. St.
county for instance, had in 18-of 351,189. Its growth durining decade was 160,665. It ias rapid now. But it will b-about 50,000 to that of 1870, of 400,000 persons. The Bou-Louis 17 members. They gi-the same number of counties west section of the State, lyin-Arkansas line, and known to benighted inhabitants, with a total population of about 96,000 persons, no one of them having a sufficient number of inhabitants to secure a single ratio. The 36 counties which are each given a single representative, (including the 17 referred to), have each less than the ratio of population laid down as the basis of representation. These counties with a total population of 190,000, are all in the southern portion of the State, among the Ozark mountains and the swamps and bayous of the southeast, contiguous to the Mississippi. They are at present inaccessible to railroads, and are likely to remain so for a long time to come. The population was largely a bushwhacking one during the civil war, and is made up of the classes most demoralized by the slave system, the smaller slaveholder, or the "poor whites." They have been reinforced by the worst elements of the rebel forces, that Missouri recruited. It is to these influences that Bourbonism deliberately commits the great State of Missouri, refusing now to submit this question separately to the people.

The analysis carried a little further will prove instructive. On the Missouri river, from St. Louis upward, there are twenty-five counties (including that of St. Louis), with a total population (1870) of 781,857, which have but forty-eight representatives, or one to 16,280 persons. In the thirty-six favored counties, the ratio is about one to 5,270. Pursued further, and the disparities will be even greater. Taking forty-eight counties of Missouri, lying contiguous to her great rivers and railroad lines, the chief in population and wealth, and it is found that a population of 1,165,706 (1870) are to have but seventy-seven representatives, while the remaining sixty-nine counties, with a population of only 555,589, have sixty-nine representatives. The ratio in the first case is over 16,000, and in the last only a little over 8,000.

These facts illustrate the character of Bourbonism, and point to the conditions they mean to sustain. Our "Liberal" friends there are almost to be consoled with, aptly illustrating, as they do, the parable of the spider and the fly. Surely they have walked into the parlor of the Democratic spider, and are now systematically being swallowed. Judging from the buzzing, the process is not an agreeable one—to the fly. As there are other conventions to be called under Democratic auspices, the country at large may know what to expect, from the example Missouri presents.

THE STATES RIGHTS HERESY is a fit one to be taught in States and by men who lead therein—which owe their existence to no previous heritage of colonial dependence, or any transitory and uncertain existence as "sovereign and independent" States,—being carved as they were out of a common territory, acquired by the efforts and means of all THE PEOPLE, as well as being settled by persons from every State without preference. At least this latter was so up to 1820, when slavery placed ban and barrier, in the way of northern migration southward. The States of Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas and Texas, six out of the eleven States that formed the slaveholders confederacy, were formed from common territory belonging to the Union, under the Constitution which "We the PEOPLE" adopted.—Florida was won from Spain, as also a part of Alabama. The major portion of that State was originally in possession of France, as was also Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas. Texas was wrested from Mexico, by a mixed process of settlement and warfare. It might perhaps better claim a little sovereign right than the others, but the conditions of admission changed all such pretences. Tennessee was part of the colonies of North Carolina and Virginia; as was also Kentucky. Missouri was a part of the Louisiana purchase. Yet these are the States in which the loudest claims are made for the right of a State to be superior at its own will to the Nation. There are twenty-four out of thirty-seven States thus carved from a common domain. Of these, Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and a portion of Wisconsin, were formed from the cession made to the Union by Virginia and other States, of their colonial claims. The balance of Wisconsin and Minnesota formed the British cession made by the treaty of peace when our Independence was acknowledged. Nebraska, Kansas, Nevada and Oregon form part of the Louisiana purchase, and California was captured from Mexico.

REVIEW OF THE MONTH.

NATIONAL.

...At the close of the last month, the difficulties on the Mexican border, had assumed a shape more threatening to international peace than theretofore. The General Government, sincerely appreciating the difficulties with which our sister Republic has had to contend, was earnest in the desire to maintain the peace. Annexation is a word belonging to the past. The Republican party and the administrations by which its policy has been represented, while accepting the "manifest destiny" idea in a loftier, nobler sense, than the old and somewhat buccaneering one in which it was formerly used, have not sought to meddle with their neighbors at all, North or South. The difference in its view might well be expressed by the words, "attraction" and "gravitation," instead of "annexation." It was this idea that ruled in the San Domingo matter. We were sought, and were not seeking. Our course toward Spain and Cuba has been governed by the same just principle, and results vindicate us, however hard it has sometimes been to stay the impulses in favor of Cuba, which have often impelled us to action not strictly defensible under international law. Towards Mexico, the Republican executives have always been most kindly and generous. Imagine what would have been the result in the days of filibustering Democracy, if the "Libra Zone" had existed then, and been as in recent years, the base of operations by organized Mexican and Indian banditti? Their States west of the Rio Grande would have been "annexed" and our boundaries "rectified" as the term goes, by being carried to the summit of the lesser Cordilleras that traverse that portion of Mexico. But the rule of justice includes that of acting on knowledge, and it has been well understood at the national capital, that the Mexican government, emerging from the midst of disorganizing events, was doing all it could to repress turbulence and bring the "Zone" within the control of its lawful authority. It has been a four-cornered struggle, with the people of Texas, rather more anxious than otherwise, for a "most justifiable provocation in Cortinas and the banditti, who at Matamoras has encouraged directed. The two national governments endeavored to keep the other bounds.

It looked a few weeks since States would be compelled to act on Mexican territory, were quietly made for the troops, and a vessel of war was in the mouth of the Rio Grande, because the American side of the river was patrolled by steam launchers, when there was a proclamation from the Governor of Texas would command on the Executive for suppressing invasion and the Mexican Government was solving the problem, by the capture of Cortinas at Matamoras and his imprisonment on a gunboat in Mexico for trial. Our vigilance slackened, and the measures wisely taken from the Texans on every occasion, that it is probable, to embroil the two Republics. We shall be found on Mexico ever necessary, only to aid to suppress the lawless men as much the enemies of Mexico.

... The country is to be the successful outcome so negotiations for the surrender of the "so-called" claimed by the certain portions of Nebraska of hunting in the Northern Republican valley. Nothing recently that so pointedly showed the Indian peace policy. The men of Ogalalla and Brulé Sioux is to be expended in the purchase of agricultural tools, cows and other things. The action showed that the elder peace policy, and that in the past they had controlled their tribes. There is a probability that the Black Hills are full of them as may be found va-purposes, will be successfully negotiated. There is no longer any danger of a general Indian outbreak. The frontier maxim that it is cheaper to feed than fight, has been fully justified. The Executive has ordered a thorough investigation into the charges relative to the Indian Territory against contractors for Indian supplies, and others. The facts that are being brought to light, showing the bad working of the contract system in connection with such matters, in the postal service, and construction of public buildings, are evidences of the truth of a statement often made—that a government is best served when it serves itself. Under the old army policy, the Western posts, etc., were furnished by trains equipped direct by the Quartermaster's department. There is always so large a margin of profit in contracts, taking them on the most moderate scale, that contractors are readily banded into "rings," and corruption funds can be easily raised to continue and enlarge the system. It is a legacy of, and distinct issue from, Democratic traditions, which teach and practice that nothing should be done by government that can be done by individuals. There will probably be striking illustrations of this view, in an attack upon the Government printing at Washington, through the Democratic House in the next Congress. That establishment costs about two millions annually. The same amount of work done by private parties under the contract system would cost at least five millions, and probably more.

... The Treasury officials are steadily pushing the work of investigation into the whisky frauds, with a view to speedy trial of the offenders. The agents of the "whisky ring" appear just now to be busily engaged in getting up a counter-fire of charges against officials and others who were instrumental in breaking the frauds. These rumors assail high officials, and one of them is aimed at the Secretary himself, accusing him of raiding only those places that in the manufacture of whisky, competed with the distillers of his own State. The public will know how to appreciate these libels, by the source from which they come. It is well to hesitate long over charges made by exposed and almost self-convicted felons. Secretary Bristow will see that the rumors in circulation, affecting the integrity of officials under him are fully probed, and their truth or falsehood made clear.

... The Board charged with the Centennial presentation of the National Departments and the workings of Government under them, have finally concluded to construct a building in the Centennial Exposition Grounds for that purpose. The cost of the building is to be $75,000, and the design adopted is architecturally elegant and appropriate. Why should not the several States follow the General Government and construct around its building, as a focal centre, structures in which to display the natural products of their soil, mines, quarries, forests and waterways, as well as statistical and other proofs of State condition and advancement. It might easily be arranged so that several States, if not willing to undertake the construction of separate structures, could combine and exhibit under one roof. Think what a display the States of California, Oregon and Nevada could make together. Those of New England might do the same. The Cotton States could gather under one roof. Others, such as New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, etc., could well afford separate structures. Of course what would be exhibited therein should and would be strictly confined to the natural products which illustrate the capacity of the State to support life and industry; and to the processes and results that make manifest its administrative ability and progress.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATIONS.

... The "Fourth" was celebrated South and North with general earnestness and heartiness. Two quite notable gatherings were had at Memphis and Atlanta—the orator at the latter place being Alexander H. Stephens, a man who is physically a wonder and intellectually a surprise. His oration is marked by the absence of nearly every objectionable sentiment; even his presentation of "State Rights Constitutionalism" being more than usually moderate, and certainly less offensive than formerly. There are two distinct philosophies of sovereignty in this country—that of the Nation and that of the States as joined in a Confederation, or to use a word much less offensive from its memories and more distinctly representing the general idea—a Federation. THE NATION is almost modern as a distinct growth of political life. In mediæval and ancient history but faint traces are found of such a collective entity. The City, the State, the Sovereign, and later, the Confederation in various forms, have each asserted their place in the life of the race. But NATIONALITY could not really exist until THE PEOPLE were recognized. Their recognition, with consequent assumption of power, created THE NATION in the sense we know and understand the term. Only from the birth of the American Republic can be dated that of the National idea. Only from the defeat of that sectionalism which cast its all upon the hazard of a die, and that, civil war, have we fully realized that THE NATION exists. It will not be long, as years count in the greater epochs, before the whole body of political thinkers will fully recognize that under Republican forms of government, a Federal nation can be strong in itself, a terror to foes, vigorous at home, vigilant in defence of rights, active in prosecuting and securing them to all, while at the same time self-government is localized, and all State administrations and privileges are carefully sustained and conserved. Political philosophers, like Mr. Stephens, are deeply imbued with classic lore, and draw their illustrations and comparisons in the main from the political history of Greece, whose petty States were always so brawlingly disposed to assert their sovereignties as against others, while at home they were quite indifferent to the civic rights of those who lived under them. Privileges they contended for; rights, never. In later eras, comparisons are made with the lusty municipalities and free cities of the middle ages. None of these afford more than isolated data for the modern era. But speculation aside, the People will settle the theorists as well as decide the theories, the outcome being as in 1861-'65, that THE NATION will continue to chrystalize itself more and more year by year, while the discussions and dissertations in which Mr. Stephens and his school indulge, may hereafter be of material advantage in checking undue tendency to the centralization of power, by keeping alive State and local integrity and activity.

The celebration at Memphis by the colored citizens, and worthy by the speeches of the Generals, Forrest and Pillow, oration being in especial good advice he gave was, in general, sensible. Exception could be taken at suggestion that, as citizens, the organizations and vote only of candidates. This is doubtless a matter that the old leaders would not wish for. It would give rise to party wranglings, and ensure uncheckered because they monopolize all matter, but because of disintegrated publican ranks.

... Passing these and noting incidents which the month presents it will be remembered that this was a Centennial anniversary of significance. The Continental Congress met for the first time in 1774 session. Provincial Congresses were organized, and with the Congress these bodies were in their several places of meeting on the Fourth of July, 1775. It was that month, two days after, the Continental Congress set forth its causes and necessity of taking up arms, ending with this declaration, person :

"We have not raised armies with intent to draw blood from Great Britain and dependent States. Necessity has not urged that desperate measure. We are not the spectacle of a people attacking their enemies, without any imputation of offence. In our native land, to do violence that is our birthright, for the property against violence actually taken up arms. We shall lay them down, and shall cease on the part of them all danger of their being renewed and not before."

These declarations and demands for peace, did not stay the inevitable loyalty to the King and his measures. It main aimed that it was only the rights of all Englishmen, in reference to the five measures. The Acts of which it was declared "As not submit" were—1. The Stamp Act; 2. The Townshend Acts; 3. The Tea Act; 4. The Townshend Acts; 5. The Tea Act; the trial in Great Britain of offences in America; 6. The Boston Port Bill; 7. The Quebec Act; 8. The Act for regulating the Government of Massachusetts; 9. The Act suspending the New York Legislature.

Important events occurred before the anti-natal Fourth now referred to. The battle of Lexington had been fought on the 19th of April; Ticonderoga had been captured May 12; and the action of Bunker Hill had occurred June 17. The second General Congress had assembled on the 10th of May. Washington had been appointed Commander-in-Chief of the American forces; he had arrived at Watertown, Mass., July 2; had been cordially received by the Massachusetts Congress, and subsequently at Cambridge, July 3, assumed command of the Continental Army. This anniversary was appropriately celebrated in the city where the event occurred.

STATE CONVENTIONS—POLITICAL.

... The Wisconsin Republican Convention met at Madison on the 7th of July. The following ticket was placed in nomination:

For Governor—Harris Luddington; Lieutenant-Governor—H. T. Eaton; Secretary of State—H. B. Warner; Treasurer—Henry Baltz; Attorney-General—John R. Bennett; Superintendent of Public Instruction—Robert Graham.

The candidate for Governor is a prominent citizen of Milwaukee, a merchant, and very popular. He has been elected to the mayoralty by a large majority. The proceedings were animated and harmonious. The platform adopted renews pledges to the Union and the Federal sovereignty; declares the just rights of the States not incompatible with this sovereignty; maintains the equal rights of all citizens, and regards labor as entitled in a high degree to the protection of government; opposes religious or other interferences with the school system; endorses the President's letter declining a re-nomination; approves the Republican administration, especially in its earnest efforts to collect the revenue, prevent and punish fraud, expose past violations and guard against their recurrence; adheres to the doctrine of legislative control of railroads and other corporations, inaugurated by the Republican party of the State; favors the early attainment of a currency convertible into coin, and therefore a gradual resumption of specie payments in such manner as to disturb the business interests of the country as little as possible; declares for a tariff for revenue only, so adjusted as to be the least burdensome and most favorable to the interests of industry; asserts the Republican party will continue by all the means in the power of the State to encourage immigration and thereby develop the resources and promote the prosperity of the nation, and holds that true education and sound morals are the best agencies for promoting the laudable cause of temperance.

... The Minnesota Democrats met in convention at St. Paul, on the 7th ult.

For Governor—D. L. Buell; Lieutenant-Governor—E. W. Durant; Secretary of State—Adolphus Bierman; State Auditor—M. Doran; State Treasurer—Albert Schaeffer; Chief Justice of the Supreme Court—L. Emmett; Railroad Commissioner—J. W. Sercherbox; Attorney General—R. Jones.

The platform reads like a transposition of those adopted by the Republican conventions which have so far met and adjourned. Its only Democratic features are denunciations of the administration and the party by which it is sustained. Like the Democracy of Kentucky, Maine, California and Iowa, that of Minnesota repudiates the financial policy of the Ohio platform, in declaring for a speedy resumption of specie payments.

... The temperance politicians have nominated the following State ticket in Minnesota:

For Governor—R. F. Humiston; Lieutenant Governor—J. B. Tuttle; Secretary of State—John H. Stevens; Chief Justice—Sherman Page; Attorney General—G. M. McCarthy; Auditor—Asa B. Hutchinson; Treasurer—H. D. Brown; Clerk of Supreme Court—P. A. Jewell; Railroad Commissioner—A. M. Greely.

This platform declares, besides its temperance planks, that corrupt parties must die, and make way for new parties. Removal from office for mere difference of political opinion is a practice opposed to sound policy and just principles. Fixed and moderate salaries with competency and sobriety should be the official rule. President, Vice-President, and United States Senators should be selected by a direct vote of the people.

The currency should be appreciated to a gold standard, and a sound system only be tolerated. All abuses in transportation management, excessive rates, and unjust local discriminations should be opposed and checked by law. That an absolute public revenue being necessary, it may properly be raised by import duties and an equitable assessment on the property and legitimate business.

The New York Prohibitionists have also nominated a State Ticket, as follows:

For Secretary, C. D. Dusenbery; Comptroller, Anson A. Hopkins; Treasurer, Stephen B. Ayers; State Engineer and Surveyor, Geo. A. Dudley; Canal Commissioner, Ira D. Bell; State Prison Inspector, John B. Gibb; Attorney General, Ed. T. Marsh.

... The Democratic Liberal nominations in Iowa are as follows:

For Governor, Shepard Leffler; Lieutenant-Governor, Capt. E. B. Woodward; Judge of the Supreme Court, W. J. Knight; Superintendent of Public Instruction, A. R. Wright.

EDUCATIONAL CONVENTIONS AND MEETINGS.

... An important body met at Chattanooga on the 30th of June and the 1st of July. It was called as an Inter-State Educational Convention, by the State Teachers' Association of Tennessee. Representatives of seven States were present, and the condition of education was discussed. Among the more prominent educators present were Mr. Harris, of St. Louis, and the State Superintendents of several States.

EDUCATIONAL.

... The college commencement orations, during the past month have been marked with an unusual degree of attention to the "higher politics." General Preston at the University of Virginia, however, managed to lower the tone and to let in a blast from the pandemonium of sectional hatreds and discord. President Woolsey, at Yale, Charles Francis Adams, at Amherst, and the President of the Industrial University, of Illinois, were among the more conspicuous of those who "improved" the occasion to point out that "Democracy is a failure;" for such, in fact, is the general burden of all their utterances, veiled under whatever euphony of expression it may. Like other critics, less able, perhaps, or less inclined to give a fair judgment, they fall into the error of attributing to the Republican institutions the evils which transmitted from the old forms of class, caste, privilege, and oppression, have not been as yet overcome by the revivifying processes that belong to new conditions. Democracy has not rounded its first fair century, but the critics pile accusingly on its broad shoulders all the vileness of ignorance and deformity inherited from the thousand years in which feudalism ran its race. President Woolsey's accusation is the most serious. He argues that honor is a characteristic of aristocratic politics, and that ours are marked conspicuously by its absence. His illustrations are often pointed, but he fails to see that the source of the low tone whereof he speaks, is found far more in unequitable and demoralizing business methods which aim to found wealth on speculation, rather than on industry and production, than it is in politics itself. The class of whom the venerable doctor is a chief representative—scholars and thinkers of more or less importance, are also to blame, in that they too often shirk their public duties, or when they perform them, do so as cavillers and patrons, rather than servants and citizens.

... General John Eaton, Commissioner of Education, also delivered a notable address before the Board of University Regents of New York, in which he stated with precision the functions of his Bureau, as an exchange for and disseminator of educational facts. He presented a startling array of facts in regard to the sum total of our illiteracy. General Eaton stated, that during the five years from July, 1870, till the present time, the Bureau of Education has prepared five annual reports (including that for 1874 now going through the press), which number altogether 4,500 pages, and twenty-nine pamphlets numbering 1,870 pages, so that the material for the five years is nearly 6,400 octavo pages. Up to the end of the last year it had distributed about 20,000 volumes and 85,000 pamphlets of its publications; 83,000 volumes of its publications were or had been under the control of Congress, and 2,500 copies of one of the reports were printed for sale by the Congressional Printer under a resolution of Congress. Since January the office had published 50,500 pamphlets, and 50,000 more will be issued very soon.

THE SENATE AND PENDING ELECTIONS.

[SEE TABLES ON PRECEDING PAGES.]

The Senatorial vacancies to be filled by the legislatures that will be in whole or in part elected at the general elections of the present and next year are divided as follows:—Republicans—Messrs. Clayton, Logan, Wright, Harvey, West, Morrill (Me.), Bontwell, Ferry (Mich.), Windom, Alcorn, Hitchcock, Cragin, Frelinghuysen, Anthony and Robertson—15; Democrats—Messrs. Goldthwaite, Saulsbury, Norwood, Stevenson, Ransom, Kelly, Cooper, Johnston and Davis—9; Independent—Hamilton—1, in all 25.

The next vacancies will occur in 1879, and the legislative elections will not take place until 1877 and '78. The Senators whose terms expire are as follows: Republicans—Messrs. Spencer, Dorsey, Sargent, Ferry (Conn.), Conover, Oglesby, Morton, Allison, Ingalls, (also the Louisiana Senator when seated), Jones (Nev.), Wadleigh, Conkling, Sherman, Cameron, Mitchell, Patterson and Morrill (Vt.)—18; Democrats—Messrs. Gordon, McCreery, Dennis, Bogy and Merriman—5, in all 23.

The last classification of vacancies—that of 1881—will be as follows: Republicans—Messrs. Hamlin, Dawes, Christiancy, McMullan, Bruce, Paddock, Sharon, Burnside, Edmunds and Cameron (Wis.)—10; Democrats—Messrs. Eaton, Bayard, Jones (Fla.), McDonald, Whyte, Cockrell, Randolph, Kernan, Thurman, Wallace, Johnson, Maxey, Withers and Caperton—14; Independent—Booth—1, in all 25.

Of the first batch of vacancies, four of the outgoing Republicans are from Southern States—Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina. The two last will certainly elect Republicans; Louisiana the same, and the first named a Democrat, in all probability. Six others, all from Western States—Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Michigan, and Minnesota. They will doubtless be re-elected or replaced by members of the same party. The other Republican vacancies are from Maine, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New Hampshire and Rhode Island. The first two and the last named seats will be refilled by Republicans, and the probabilities are strongly in favor of the same result in the Granite State and New Jersey.

Among the Democratic vacancies, and that of Mr. Hamilton, Texas, Oregon is the only Western or Northern State represented. The others are Alabama, Delaware, Georgia, Kentucky, North Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia and West Virginia. Alabama and North Carolina, which have both been Republican States and by fair majorities, seem now to be entirely under Democratic control. So with the two Virginias. Alabama ought to be redeemed, and probably will be at the coming Presidential election. Fair expectations are held out in Oregon for Republican success. But it will be safer to count Alabama and Oregon as doubtful and the others as Democratic.

The following States are those in which the executive chair is to be filled at the elections of the present year; California, Kentucky, Ohio, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, Minnesota, Massachusetts, Maryland and Maine—9. Of these all but Kentucky, Ohio and Maryland, are now Republican States. Ohio will be so after the next election, it is confidentially expected.

In addition to the more important national results, flowing from general elections in nineteen States—of twenty-five Senators, the character of whose seats are to be most directly affected, and of nine Governors to be elected, there are also to be elected four Representatives in Congress from California, and six from Mississippi. These ten seats were filled in the last Congress by seven Republicans, one Democrat and one Independent. The probability is that there will be no marked change, unless by the California Independent, writing himself Republican hereafter.

In addition to the regular elections for Representatives in Congress, referred to, there are several vacancies in other States caused by the decease of those originally elected. One of these is in the first district of Massachusetts, to fill the seat so long and honorably occupied by Mr. Buffington. In New York, the thirty-third district is vacant, Hon. A. F. Allen, Democrat, having died since the adjournment of the 43d Congress. Vacancies exist also in Pennsylvania, Oregon and Tennessee. These facts show the grave importance of the elections this year, and should arouse every one to the utmost activity.

EXECUTIVE AND DEPARTMENT DOINGS.

THE EXECUTIVE.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT.

The President has appointed Charles S. Douglas, of the District of Columbia, to be United States Consul at Puerto Plata, San Domingo.

William C. Nichols, Assistant Treasurer of the United States at Chicago, Illinois.

Frederick E. Grossman, Collector of Customs for the District of Fernandina, Florida.

John Taffe, of Nebraska, to be Secretary of the Territory of Colorado.

John R. Clark, of Nebraska, to be Surveyor General of the United States for the District of Nebraska and Iowa, vice E. Cunningham, resigned.

H. M. Keyser, of Illinois, to be Receiver of Public Moneys at Helena, Montana, vice J. L. Sheridan, declined.

Thomas A. Riley, of Pennsylvania, Agent for the Indians of White River Agency in Dakota.

Charles D. Bradley, Attorney for the United States for the Territory of Colorado.

A. Chee, interpreter to the United States Consul at Hong Kong, China.

STATE DEPARTMENT.

CHIEFS OF BUREAUS IN THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

The President has signed the commissions of the following named persons, to be Chiefs of Bureaus in the Department of State:

Charles Payson, Statistics; Ferdinand Jefferson, Rolls and Library; Robert C. Morgan, Accounts; Arthur B. Wood, Consular; Henry D. J. Pratt, Diplomatic; John H. Haswell, Indexes and Archives, and Henry L. Thomas, Translator.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

REGULATIONS CONCERNING THE PAYMENT OF INTEREST ON REGISTERED BONDS OF THE UNITED STATES.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, June 26, 1875.

Hereafter, at the expiration of seven months from the time each schedule is payable, the United States Treasurer, assistant treasurers, and designated depositaries are directed to forward to the First Auditor, for examination and settlement, any and all schedules for the payment of coin interest on the registered bonds of the United States.

Should any amounts remain due on these schedules, transcripts of such amounts, the names of the payees, &c., should be made and retained in the respective offices.

The total amount so outstanding and unpaid must be paid at once into the Treasury, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, as a "repayment on account of interest on registered bonds," and the original certificate of deposit with the amount pertaining to each loan stated thereon, must be forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury. The fact of such repayment must be noted on the retained transcript as well as opposite each amount outstanding and unpaid upon the original schedule returned to the department.

If claims are hereafter made upon such officers for the outstanding amounts, the officers will refer the claims to the Secretary of the Treasury, noting on them the date of the original schedule, the date of the repayment of the amount into the Treasury, and endorsing upon the retained transcript the date of such reference to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The provisions of this Circular are intended to apply to all registered interest accounts hereafter rendered.

B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary of the Treasury.

CIRCULAR INSTRUCTIONS TO OFFICERS OF CUSTOMS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 23, 1875.

In the receipt of silver and minor coins of the United States for payment of duties on imports, the following instructions will hereafter be observed by officers of the customs:

Silver Coins.—1. When the total amount of duties in any one entry cannot be paid entirely in gold coin, gold certificates, or demand notes, because involving a fractional part of a dollar, such fractional part may be paid in silver coins of the United States.

2. When the total amount of duties, payable in any one entry, does not exceed five dollars, such total amount may be paid in silver coins of the United States.

Minor Coins.—Minor coins of the United States—i. e., those not of gold or silver coinage, may be received when necessary in making change to any amount less than ten cents in any single transaction.

CHAS. F. CONANT, Acting Secretary.

SUPPLEMENT TO DECISION NO. 177—CONCERNING THE STAMP TAX UPON DRAFTS, BILLS, CHECKS, OR ORDERS DRAWN IN THE UNITED STATES UPON A BANK, BANKER OR TRUST COMPANY IN A FOREIGN COUNTRY.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
WASHINGTON, June 30, 1875.

In Decision No. 177, dated April 12, 1875, "concerning the stamp tax upon bank checks, drafts, orders, or vouchers," &c., it was held that "drafts or bills drawn in the United States upon a foreign country need not be stamped, not being 'vouchers' in the meaning of the law while in this country." That ruling is, from and after this date, reversed.

The statute in question, section 15 of the act of February 8, 1875, imposes the stamp tax of two cents upon every "bank check, draft, order, or voucher for the payment of any sum of money whatsoever, drawn upon any bank, banker, or trust company."

Drafts, bills, checks, or orders drawn in the United States on a bank, banker, or trust company in a foreign country, although perhaps not "vouchers" while in this country, appear to me to be clearly taxable under the terms of the statute. They are drafts, check, or orders drawn upon a bank, banker, or trust company, and there is nothing in the law limiting to this country the locality of the bank, &c., upon which the paper is drawn.

Collectors will at once notify the banks, bankers, and trust companies in their several districts of this change of ruling, and will require the payment of the stamp tax on the instruments referred to, from and after this date.

D. D. PRATT, Commissioner.

CHANGES AND APPOINTMENTS UNDER THE RE ORGANIZATION BILL.

The act of the last session of Congress, reorganizing the United States Treasury, went into operation on the 1st of July. The bill reduces the clerical force about one hundred and five, and increases the salaries of those holding the more responsible positions. The following are the changes and appointments made:

Chief of Division of Warrants—J. S. Powers.

Assistant Chief of Division—W. F. McLennan, vice Whiting, reduced.

Chiefs of Divisions—William F. Clark, customs; P. K. Upton, sub-Treasury; E. P.

Gaines, Internal Revenue; A. L. Sturdevant, Stationery; D. Lyman, Navigation; S. J. Kimball, Revenue Marine.

Assistant Chiefs of Divisions—E. B. Daskam, S. A. Johnson, Charles Lyman, D. B. Lander and E. W. Clarke, Jr.

Division of Loans—Walter Stewart, Receiving Clerk of Bonds, and George L. Warren, bookkeeper.

Division of Currency—Isaac Thompson, Chief, and Charles H. Brown, Assistant.

First Auditor's Office—Thaddeus Sturgis, William P. Marsh, John B. Bently and Allen F. McMillan, Chiefs of Divisions; James B. Cleveland, Fourth Class.

Third Auditor's Office—J. F. Jones, J. Tichenor, A. Cauldwell, George Doolittle and W. H. Whitney, Chiefs of Division.

DEPUTIES IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

William P. Titcomb, Deputy Register of the Treasury.

Henry A. Lockwood, Deputy Commissioner of Customs.

W. M. Hemphill Jones, Deputy First Controller.

Edmund B. Curtis, Deputy Second Controller.

Henry K. Leaver, Deputy First Auditor.

Charles F. Herring, Deputy Second Auditor.

Allen M. Gangewer, Deputy Third Auditor.

William B. Moore, Deputy Fourth Auditor.

Jonathan B. Mann, Deputy Fifth Auditor.

Frederick B. Lilley, Deputy Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-office Department.

REDEMPTION OF 5-20 BONDS.

The Secretary of the Treasury, on the 24th of June, made the twenty-first call of 5-20 bonds for redemption. The call is for $5,000,000 of coupon bonds, known as the fourth series, Act of February 25, 1862, dated May 1, 1862, as follows:

$50—No. 21001 to No. 21700, inclusive.

$100—No. 59101 to No. 64500, inclusive.

$500—No. 31901 to No. 34000, inclusive.

$1,000—No. 91501 to No. 96900, inclusive.

To be redeemed at the U. S. Treasury, in Washington, on and after September 24, 1875, at which date interest on the called bonds will cease.

EXECUTIVE AND DEPARTMENT DOINGS.

OUTSTANDING NATIONAL BANK NOTES.

The following statement represents the actual amount of outstanding National Bank notes on July 1, last, as compared with the amount outstanding last year, and shows the operation of the new Currency act:

National Bank notes outstanding June 20, 1874, $349,894,182; National Bank notes outstanding January 14, 1875 $351,861,450; national bank notes outstanding July 1, 1875, $351,869,008; circulation issued since act of June 20, 1874, $11,601,892; circulation destroyed and retired, $9,627,066; actual increase of circulation, $1,974,824; legal-tender notes deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, since June 20, 1874, for the purpose of retiring National Bank circulation, $25,523,057; balance of deposits of banks in liquidation previous to that date, $3,813,675, making $29,336,732—less circulation retired and destroyed, $9,627,066—leaving, July 1, legal tenders now deposited with the Treasurer by banks retiring their circulation, $19,709,666; legal-tender notes withdrawn from circulation, being eighty per centum upon $7,785,525 additional circulation issued under the act of January 14, 1875, $6,228,420.

LEGAL-TENDERS—ADDITIONAL CIRCULATION ISSUED.

The Comptroller of the Currency reports the amount of additional circulation issued during the month of June at $1,315,525. The amount of legal tender notes deposited during the same period, $3,009,626. Additional circulation issued since the passage of the act of June 20, 1874, $11,601,892. Amount of circulation destroyed and retired during the same time, $9,627,066, showing the actual increase of Bank circulation during the year of $1,978,826.

Amount of legal-tender notes deposited for the purpose of retiring the circulation since the passage of the same act, $25,523,057, and amount deposited by banks in liquidation previous to that date, $3,813,675, making a total of $29,336,732.

Deducting from this the amount of $9,627,066, the amount of circulation permanently retired will leave $1,976,766 legal-tender notes on deposit July 1, for retiring the circulation.

REDEMPTION OF N.

The total amount of National Bank notes redeemed and assorted at Redemption Agency during June 30, is $130,321,943. $115,119,445 consisted of circulation, which were delivered to the Comptroller of the Currency for replacement with new notes. The remainder were notes fit for circulation and were forwarded by express to the Banks by which they were issued.

RETIRING FRACTIONAL

Under the act of July 1, 1875, for the resumption of specie payments, the Treasury Department has $10,000,000 of the bonds of the United States, authorized by the act, and with the proceeds has $9,000,000 in silver for the purpose of retiring the fractional currency.

RETIREMENT OF FIVE-

The Comptroller of the Currency reports that to retire all circulating notes of five dollars of the United States, the notes of that denomination successfully counterfeited and Traders' National Bank, National Bank, Paxton, Bank, Canton, Ill. National Bank, out the country are required to send notes of these banks of five dollars to the Treasury and no additional issue of five dollar notes will hereafter be issued.

EXPRESS CHARGES FOR CURRENCY.

Adams Express Company has been engaged in carrying currency for the Treasury Department the National Bank of Washington to the various institutions throughout the country as is sent here by the Banks. Their charge for carrying currency is at the rate of twenty-five cents per dollar. They now declare that it is too great to permit them to continue in the business at that rate and accordingly demand

$1,000, which they state is half brokers' rates. They have notified the Secretary of the Treasury that after the 5th of August, thirty days from date of notification, they will make their charge for carriage at the increased prices mentioned. As the daily receipts of National Bank notes exceeds at times a million dollars, the proposed change becomes an important question to the National Banks.

TREASURY DECISIONS—DUTIABLE ARTICLES INTRODUCED THROUGH THE MAILS—THE ADMISSION OF WORKS OF ART.

In a letter dated June 29, Secretary Bristow says:

"I may add that the importation of valuable articles into the United States by means of newspapers or letters through the mails, has no sanction in law, and if attempted with intent to evade the payment of duties subjects the articles to forfeiture, and parties making such attempt, or knowingly receiving such articles, to prosecution for penalties provided by law."

The provision in the free list for the admission of works of art, the production of American artists, is held not to include copies of such productions, unless such copies are actually made by American artists; nor does the mere importation by artists suffice to give such copies the character of productions of an American artist, which alone entitles them to free entry.

INTERNAL REVENUE RECEIPTS OF 1874 AND 1875 COMPARED.

The following detailed statement shows the aggregate of certificates of deposit received at the Treasury Department from internal revenue during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1875, as compared with receipts from the same source during the year ended June 30, 1874:

Month	1874.	1875

THE WHISKY FRAUDS—SEIZURES—PROSECUTIONS.

The result of the late raid on illicit whisky is thus summarized by the Internal Revenue Department:

"Amount of money assessed against distillers, $317,000; fines assessed against rectifiers, $347,000; number of distilleries and rectifying houses seized, 47; seizures of illicit whisky in hands of dealers other than distillers and rectifiers, 152. It is estimated that the expense of trial will average $100 to each case, $20 of which will probably go to the district attorneys. If successful the other $80 in each case will have to be paid by defendants.

"In all cases where packages have been seized in the hands of dealers, conviction may not be secured, but in the cases of distillers and rectifiers the evidence in possession of the Government is abundant and convincing. The dealers claim the illicit packages found in their possession were purchased in the usual manner; that they contained all the outward marks of being lawful merchandize; and that there was no purpose on their part to defraud the Government. The number of officers dismissed in consequence of the revelations made, is 66. Of these 40 were gaugers, 13 storekeepers, 4 revenue agents, 3 collectors, 2 deputy collectors, 2 supervisors, and 2 district attorneys.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

The merchandise and specie imports and exports for April and May, as furnished by the Statistical Bureau, are as follows:

STATISTICS OF IMMIGRATION.

From returns made to the Bureau of Statistics it appears that there arrived at the port of New York during the month of June, 1875, 13,989 immigrants, of whom 7,651 were males, and 6,338 females. During the month of June, 1874, there arrived at the same port 20,602 immigrants, of whom 11,547 were males, and 9,055 females. For the three months ended June 30, 1875, 45,566 immigrants arrived in New York, of whom 25,635 were males, and 19,931 females. For the corresponding period of 1874 the number of arrivals was 68,955, showing a decrease of 23,389 in 1875. Of the total number arrived during the month of June, 1875, 3,264 came from Germany ; 2,192 from Ireland, and 2,246 from England.

ACTUAL BANK-NOTE CIRCULATION.

The following is from the Memphis, Tenn., Appeal.

The Chicago Times calls attention to the fact that the national bank notes outstanding amount to $319,282,309 and that the bonds deposited to secure them amount to only $275,735,500. As the law requires that notes shall not be issued beyond ninety per cent. of the bonds deposited to secure them, the amount of bonds necessary to secure the reported circulation is $354,668,889. It follows, therefore, that the circulation is reported greater than it really is, or that the amount of security bonds is reported less, or that the bonds deposited are $12,350,288 less than the law requires. Here we have one of the mysteries of the treasury book-keeping; and it is no creature up at all by the statement published by Comptroller Knox, about the middle of last month, that the bank circulation had been contracted nearly $16,000,000. under the act of June, 1874, which would bring the total bank circulation down to about $333,000,000. The public would thank Mr Knox to state the exact truth of the matter, if he knows or can find out what it is.

Many of the charges of the newspaper press, made against the Bureaus of the United States Treasury, grow out of typographical errors of the press. In the above the first line of figures, as given in the Appeal, ($319,282,309), was reported from the Comptroller's office $349,282,309, and should have been so printed. This error of the press makes a difference of $30,000,000.

The official report of the actual bank-note circulation on the 1st July, 1875, is as follows :

Amount of circulation actually outstanding, July 1, 1875.....	$346,393,869
Amount due banks for mutilated circulation returned.....	5,475,139
National bank circulation.....	$351,869,008

This circulation is secured by

1. U. S. bonds amounting to.....	$376,314,500
90 per cent. upon which circulation is issued, equal to.....	338,683,150
2. Legal-tenders deposited with the Treasurer U. S. for insolvent and liquidating banks..	6,319,652
And for banks reducing their circulation.....	13,390,015
	$3 8,392,817

Making an excess of security of $6,523,809, besides the 10 per cent. margin on $376,314,500 U. S. bonds, which is $37,631,400, and the premium which the same bonds would bring in the market, ranging from 116 to 121½. This is official, and "the exact truth" called for. It will therefore be seen that the Chicago Times and Memphis Appeal are entirely in error in the statement that the outstanding national bank circulation is greater than the security for the same.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

THE INDIANS—CIRCULAR TO AGENTS—SERVICES OF SPECIAL ATTORNEYS OR AGENTS OF THE TRIBES TO BE DISPENSED WITH.

WASHINGTON, July 11, 1875.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has issued the following circular to Indian agents :—

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 10, 1875.

SIR:—Owing to the unnecessary expense and confusion and the not infrequent fraudulent practices which are liable to arise from the employment of attorneys and agents by the Indians for the presentation of their wishes and the prosecution of their tribal business before the department, hereafter, by the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, no such services on the part of agents or attorneys will be recognized by this Bureau, unless the party proposing to act as agent or attorney for any Indian tribe, shall have first submitted the matter in which he desires to act for the Indians for the consideration of the department, and shall have received specific authority from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, approved by the Secretary of the Interior, to go before said Indians and propose to them to undertake such service in their behalf; and in all cases any conference or negotiation with the Indians by any parties acting under the authority of this regulation must be conducted in open council, called in the usual manner and in the presence of the Indian agent.

You will call the attention of your Indians to this regulation, if any occasion exists among them for so doing; and you will acquaint them fully that it is not the design of the department, in the regulations hereby established, in any way to hinder the prosecution of their business, but to save them from unnecessary expense and protect them from the designs of evil men; and you will also instruct them that it is the wish of the department that all their business be conducted through their agent. And whenever they have anything which they may desire to communicate to this office, it will be the duty of the agent to transmit such communication, giving full information as to their wishes. E. P. SMITH, Commissioner.

NAVY DEPARTMENT.

CONTRACTS FOR NAVY YARD SUPPLIES AWARDED.

The contracts for furnishing supplies to the Navy Yards throughout the country, bids for which were opened recently, have been awarded. Among those who have received contracts are George H. Creed, D. Babcock & Co., William A. Hyatt, Walton Brothers, Degraw, Aymar & Co., J. W. Duryee, and Samuel G. French, of New York; Howard, Snelling & Co., and Gayle & Co., of Boston; R. H. Powell & Co., of Philadelphia; R. H. Hawley, of Chicago; Watson & Pettinger, of Brooklyn; Whittier, Fuller & Co., and Farwell & Co., of San Francisco; and Linforth, Kellogg & Co., of Mare Island, Cal.

THE YELLOW FEVER SCOURGE.

Prominent medical and other officers of the navy who have at various times been in localities afflicted with the yellow fever, and paid some attention to its cause and treatment, express the opinion that it would be wise, as a timely precaution, for all the Southern cities on the Atlantic coast to make and enforce stringent sanitary rules, as the early appearance of the fever at Key West, Fla., is an indication that it may extend along the coast this summer.

GENERAL POST OFFICE.

POSTAL CARDS AND STAMPS.

Reports just made by Third Assistant Postmaster General Barbershow that 107,616,000 postal cards were issued during the fiscal year which ended June 30 last, against 91,079,000 issued for the year which ended June 30, 1874. The increase is equivalent to about 18 1-6 per cent., which shows that the postal cards are growing in popular favor.

The value of the issue of ordinary postage stamps during the year ending June 30, 1875, was $13,271,479, an increase of $996,237 over the previous year; of newspaper and periodical postage stamps, $815,902.47; of ordinary stamped envelopes and wrappers, $4,124,477.34, an increase of $242,245.58; of postal cards, $1,076,160; of total issues for sale to the public, $24,288,018.81, an increase of $2,219,794.05 over the fiscal year ended June 30, 1874. The sale of official postage stamps for the fiscal year amounted to $834,970.25, a decrease of $581,874.95 since June 30, 1874; official stamped envelopes, $354,522.18, an increase of $1,065.52 over the year 1874.

U. S. SUPREME COURT.

CONFEDERATE MONEY—SUPREME COURT DECISION—ITS INVALIDITY. IN THE SETTLEMENT OF DEBTS DURING THE WAR.

The Supreme Court, in the case of Catharine Fretz, survivor, etc., against Ralph Stover, executor of Charles Stover et al; an appeal from the Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, has rendered a decision as follows:

"The controversy in this case grows out of a bond executed by Charles Stover to Fretz and wife, on the 8th day of April, 1861, for $2,366.18, payable on or before the 1st day of March, 1863. The bond was executed in Fauquier county, Va., where Stover lived, and was secured by a deed of trust on land in that county, both of which were delivered to Samuel Chilton, by Stover, on the day of their date. The execution and delivery of these obligations were in pursuance of a settlement made in the preceding month of February at Warrenton, Virginia, by Fretz and Stover of a long-pending litigation. The war of the rebellion ensued soon after the settlement, and all communication ceased, and, indeed, became unlawful between Pennsylvania and Virginia. After the war had closed, on inquiry, it was found that Stover, a short time before the bond matured and in satisfaction of it, had paid to Chilton Virginia bank notes and Confederate paper at their nominal or par value, and got possession of the bond or deed of trust. Naturally, Fretz and wife were dissatisfied with these proceedings, and in repudiation of them they filed their bill in chancery to set up the deed of trust and have it enforced, on the ground that Chilton had no authority to receive payment in such paper, nor Stover the right to make it. The bill charges actual fraud between Chilton and Stover, in this, that Stover, taking advantage of Chilton's great pecuniary necessities, induced him to receive the paper at par in payment and discharge of the bond.

"Stover filed his answer denying that these payments were the result of an unlawful and fraudulent combination between the respondent and Chilton. He insists, however, that they were in law a full discharge and satisfaction of the debt and trust deed; but, if this were not so, that, to the extent of the compensation due by Fretz and wife to Chilton for professional services, he should not be compelled to pay a second time.

"We are brought directly to the question whether the payments by Charles Stover to Samuel Chilton were, under the circumstances surrounding the parties, of any validity. The decision is that the instructions given to Chilton by his client were not applicable to a state of war, and that his settlement for money current in the Confederacy was void, and that Stover had no right to discharge the debt in anything but legal money of the United States."

Mr. Justice Davis delivered the opinion of the Court.

We are not prepared to believe that the Catholic Telegraph faithfully represents the sentiments of our Catholic fellow citizens, but the following extract from its issue of June 24th, shows how deeply rooted its prejudice is against our common school system:

"Catholics who think they can approve of the secular system of public education which has been adopted in this country, would do well to acquaint themselves with the dogmatic decisions of the Holy See contained in the 47th and 48th propositions of the Syllabus. 'Aut nun us errat Christus'—'either the world or Christ errs.'* In the Syllabus the Church has explicitly and absolutely condemned education, from which religious instruction has been eliminated. If any Catholic approves of this relic of paganism, he must, as a consequence, hold that the Church has erred, and he has therefore, given his assent to heresy. There is no way in which he can evade this conclusion. No sophistry is strong enough to enable him to pass this deepest of spiritual pitfalls. On this point, as in all other matters of doctrine, he must either be with Christ or against Him. He cannot make a neutral position upon which the condemnation of the Holy See does not fall."

We often hear Thomas Jefferson spoken of as "the father of Democracy." This is true in one sense and false in another. Jefferson's party up to 1816 was known as the Republican party. It was so called by Jefferson, known as such among its followers, and was so styled in all the party calls published during that period. Therefore, correctly speaking, Jefferson was the father of the Republican party. The term, Democracy, was fixed upon Jefferson's party by its opponents in order to create odium against it. After Jefferson's time it became a popular name with the party and was finally adopted by it.

THE REPUBLIC,

A Political Science Monthly Magazine.

The fifth volume of THE REPUBLIC commenced in July, 1875.

As in the past the highest ambition of its publishers will be to render THE REPUBLIC a reliable medium of information on all subjects connected with Republican government—Federal, State, and municipal. Washington, in his Farewell Address, justly claimed that "in proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened." The object of THE REPUBLIC writers is only to educate the people—and especially our young men who are now stepping upon the stage of public life—in the principles of political science, but to impress upon every individual conscience the sacred obligation of fidelity to the public interests. It was Benjamin Franklin who uttered the great truth that "nothing can be politically right that is morally wrong," and he, too, pronounced the equally logical axiom that "virtue is the soul of the Republic." It will be the duty and aim of THE REPUBLIC to inculcate these and similar truths, to commend integrity and fidelity, to sustain patriotic statesmen in all laudable efforts, to establish and perpetuate the principles of good government; and in this way to contribute to the advancement of the physical, intellectual, and moral condition of the people, as well as to the national prosperity, virtue and power.

THE REPUBLIC will continue to chronicle faithfully the current action of the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Departments of the Government, to comment impartially upon the acts of public men, and to do what may be done within its sphere to inform the people and improve the Government.

The fifth volume of THE REPUBLIC will be printed from a new and handsome type. Several important improvements will be introduced in the variety, arrangement, and make-up of the magazine. Under an enlarged corps of the ablest writers a broader field of political review and discussion of national questions will be adopted; and it is believed that the new volume will be a decided improvement in every way upon its predecessors.

TERMS:

THE REPUBLIC is a magazine of sixty-four pages, published monthly, at $2 a year, or twenty copies for $10. The postage, in all cases, after January 1, 1875, will be paid by the publishers. A few copies of the back volumes may yet be obtained, either bound or in numbers. Remittances should be made by postal money-order or registered letter.

VOL. V. WASHINGTON, D. C., SEPTEMBER, 1875. No. 3.

CAN THE NATION TRUST THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY?

Can the nation trust Democracy with the administration of the Government? This question has already been answered by the people four times; first in 1860; second in 1864, third in 1868, fourth in 1872. Each time, the answer has been given by overwhelming majorities: "The Democratic party cannot be trusted with the control of the Government!"

Is there anything in the present condition of the country, or the present character of the Democratic party to call for a change of the popular verdict in 1876?

If there is, what is its nature? Have the people become less loyal to the Union, or has Democracy become more loyal? To call for a reversal of the verdict, rendered four times, a radical change must be shown, either in the sentiments of the people, or in the sentiments of the Democratic party. Has this change taken place? If so, when, where, and under what circumstances?

No friend of good Government, who desires peace and unity could for a moment desire the restoration of Democracy to power, if he felt assured that its political principles were the same as those held previous to the rebellion, during its existence and throughout the period of reconstruction.

To believe otherwise, would be to believe that good citizens could be found, who would be willing to reject the party whose wisdom, patriotism, and courage saved the Government, and accept the party whose energies and influence were united in the effort to overthrow it. Fair minded men will agree to the two propositions. First: The man who proves his friendship in the hour of need ought not to be distrusted in the hour of prosperity. Second: The man who showed his enmity when friendship was needed, has no claim to our confidence when his enmity can no longer injure us. It is possible for a former friend to become an enemy, and an old enemy to become a friend, but the proof of the change must precede the belief that it has actually taken place.

The rule holds good with parties, for parties are but individuals in their collective capacity, and for this reason it may be laid down as a rule, that whatever of sentiment or principle, characterizes individuals, will surely find reflection in the parties with which they affiliate.

Therefore, the practical question for reasonable men to ask and answer is: Is the Democratic party in principle and sentiment, the same as it was in 1861? If it is, then it cannot be trusted to-day. If it is not the same, wherein does it differ? Is the change a radical one, so honestly and earnestly made, as to preclude the possibility of a recurrence of troubles which were met and overcome by the Republican party; troubles which cost the nation hundreds of thousands of lives, and millions of treasure?

Before the people can consider, on equal terms, the restoration of Democracy to power, the proof must be submitted, that a radical change has taken place in its sentiments and principles, its teachings and purposes. The proof must be strong, so clear, that he who runs may read; for on a question of such vital importance to the future welfare of the Republic, the people cannot afford to run any risks. The preservation of the Government has cost them too much to try any political experiments in the management of its affairs.

The people know what the Republican party has done, is now doing, and will do in the future for the country. On the vital question of unity and nationality they are assured that it can be trusted. True in war, they know it cannot prove false in peace. True in the past, they have every reason to believe that it will continue true in the future. Democracy having been false in the past they have the right to demand the strongest guarantee that it will not be, if entrusted with power, false in the future.

Can Democracy give such guarantee? Has it abandoned the fatal doctrine of State Rights as preached by Calhoun, fought for by the Southern Confederacy and practically maintained by the Southern wing of the party today? If on these points, the proof is clear, that a radical change has taken place, then the issue is simply one of administration, turning upon the relative character of men, and not upon the principles which they hold. The result, whatever it might be, would no longer be experimental, for the people would feel assured that a change of administration would not imperil the peace and unity of the nation.

A careful review of the Democratic record, must be convincing to the unprejudiced mind, that no change has taken place in the sentiments of Democracy. What it believed in the days of Buchanan, it advocated in 1860, endorsed in 1864, affirmed in 1868, re-affirmed in 1872, and unless checked in its pretensions by the votes of the American people, it will re-establish through a Democratic Administration in 1876.

DEMOCRACY, THE STATE RIGHTS PARTY.

For the past forty years, the Democratic party has been controlled by men who accepted the fatal doctrine of State Rights, as preached by John C. Calhoun, as the basis of our Federal Union.

Under this doctrine, the State was held to be supreme. The Union was regarded as a mere arrangement for convenience, to be cast aside, whenever it suited the pleasure or interest of a State to so decide.

A State could obey or disobey the laws of the nation, just as it saw fit. The voice of a State convention, could, under this doctrine, place the State outside of the national authority. A simple resolution declaring that the State had withdrawn from the Union was all that was required to transform the part into the whole, or the fraction of a nation into a nation, supreme in its own sovereignty. It was held by the advocates of this State Rights doctrine, that a State, entering the Union of its own free will, could withdraw with equal freedom. In other words one party to a contract, could break it at his pleasure, because he entered it of his own free will.

The fatal heresy of State Rights could have died with the Rebellion. The Southern Confederacy illustrated its full power, and with its overthrow the doctrine itself has been buried from sight forever.

If Northern Democracy had been free of its influence, this would have been the case, but it retained the old poison in its system. It has never been free from it, and to unite with the Bourbon Democracy of the South, it is under the control of Calhounism, and liable, if entrusted with power, to again plunge the country, on some slight pretext, into troubles even greater than those hitherto endured.

THE DEMOCRATIC RECORD BEFORE THE WAR

Through Democracy, the South, prior to the war, practically controlled the government. It shaped the affairs of the nation to suit its own interest. It filled its important offices at home and abroad. It gave direction to national legislation; it created the policy of the government, and when it could no longer govern, it endeavored to destroy. This statement is a correct one. It has passed into history and cannot be refuted.

Alexander H. Stephens who afterward became the Vice President of the Southern Confederacy, delivered a speech against the policy of secession, before the State Convention of Georgia, January, 1861. He said:

"What have we to gain by this proposed change of our relation to the general Government?"

"We have always had the control of it, and can yet, if we remain in it, and are as united as we have been. We have had a majority of the Presidents chosen from the South, as well as the control and management of those chosen from the North. We have had sixty years of Southern Presidents to their twenty-four, thus controlling the Executive Department. So, of the judges of the Supreme Court, we have had eighteen from the South, and but eleven from the North: although nearly four-fifths of the judicial business has arisen in the Free States, yet a majority of the Court has always been from the South. This we have required so as to guard against any interpretation of the Constitution unfavorable to us. In like manner we have been equally watchful to guard our interests in the Legislative branch of Government. In choosing the presiding Presidents (pro tem) of the Senate, we have had twenty-four to their eleven. Speakers of the House, we have had twenty-three, and they twelve. While the majority of the Representatives, from their greater population, have always been from the North, yet we have generally secured the Speaker, because he to a great extent, shapes and controls the Legislation of the country. Nor have we had less control in every other Department of the General Government. Attorney Generals we have had fourteen, while the North have had but five. Foreign Ministers, we have had eighty-six and they but fifty-four. While three-fourths of the business which demands diplomatic agents abroad is clearly from the Free States, from their greater commercial interests, yet we have had the principal embassies so as to secure the world-markets for our cotton, tobacco, and sugar on the best possible terms. We have had a vast majority of the higher officers of both army and navy, while a larger portion of the soldiers and sailors were drawn from the North. Equally so of clerks, auditors, and comptrollers filling the Executive Department, the records show for the last fifty years that of the three thousand thus employed, we have had more than two-thirds of the same, while we have had but one-third of the white population of the Republic.

"Again, look at another item, and one, be assured, in which we have a great and vital interest: it is that of revenue, or means of supporting Government. From official documents, we learn that a fraction over three-fourths of the revenue collected for the support of Government, has uniformly been raised from the North.

"The expense for the transportation of the mail in the free States was, by the report of the Postmaster-General for the year 1860, a little over $3,000,000, while the income was $19,000,000. But in the slave States the transportation of the mail was $14,716,000, while the revenue from the same was $8,001,026, leaving a deficit of $6,704,974, to be supplied by the North for our accommodation, and without it we must have been entirely cut off from this most essential branch of the Government."

This, be it remembered, is not the language of a Republican trying to paint a picture for party effect, but the words of the Vice-President of the late Confederacy, who will be accepted as good authority by the most ultra Democrat.

The statement shows clearly:

1st. That the Democratic party before the war was under the control of the South, and used its power to promote Southern interests and ambition at the expense of the North.

2d. It shows that the South had no justification for its attempt to withdraw from the Union.

3d. It proves the fallacy of its pretensions, that it was driven into rebellion by Northern oppression.

4th. It clearly indicates the treasonable nature of the party that preferred to break up a Government that it could no longer control, rather than submit to constitutional authority.

5th. It foreshadows the ascendancy of Southern influence in all departments of the Government under Democratic restoration.

The statement made by Mr. Stephens must convince all who are open to conviction, that the Southern States had no just cause for complaint. The defeat of the State Rights party, and through this defeat, the loss of the controlling power, were the causes which brought about secession.

Long before the election of Abraham Lincoln, the Democratic threat had been made both in the North and the South, that the slave States would not submit to a Republican President. The threat was general throughout the South, and was repeated by Northern leaders on the stump, and by the Democratic press, without a word of protest or condemnation. On the contrary, every encouragement was held out, that the Democrats of the North would not only endorse the threat of secession, but lend material aid in carrying it out.

In December, 1860, Mr. Gregg, one of the delegates to the South Carolina Convention, said:

"If we wish to find the immediate cause of the secession of South Carolina, the immediate cause of all is the election of Abraham Lincoln."

In the same convention Mr. Dargan said:

"It is not true, in point of fact, that all the Northern people are hostile to the rights of the South. We have a Spartan band in every Northern State. It is due to them they should know the reasons which influence us. According to our apprehension, the necessity which exists for our immediate withdrawal from association with the Northern States is that this hostile abolition party have the control of the Government."

In November, 1860, Mr. Lawrence M. Keitt delivered a speech in Charleston, S. C. He said, in answer to an assertion that any attempt to withdraw from the Union would be met with force:

"Let me tell you, there are a million of Democrats in the North, who, when the Black Republicans attempt to march upon the South, will be found a wall of fire in the front." (Cries of "That's so!" and applause.)

This was the feeling through the entire South. Democracy had been regarded as the State Rights party, and it was believed that any attempt to interfere with a State in its withdrawal from the Union, would unite Northern Democrats in armed opposition to it. This belief was encouraged by prominent leaders of the Northern wing of the party.

An extract from a letter written January 6, 1850, by ex-President Pierce to Jefferson Davis, and found in Davis's home, in Missis-

The people know what the Republican party has done, is now doing, and will do in the future for the country. On the vital question of unity and nationality they are assured that it can be trusted. True in war, they know it cannot prove false in peace. True in the past, they have every reason to believe that it will continue true in the future. Democracy having been false in the past they have the right to demand the strongest guarantee that it will not be, if entrusted with power, false in the future.

Can Democracy give such guarantee? Has it abandoned the fatal doctrine of State Rights as preached by Calhoun, fought for by the Southern Confederacy and practically maintained by the Southern wing of the party to-day? If on these points, the proof is clear, that a radical change has taken place, then the issue is simply one of administration, turning upon the relative character of men, and not upon the principles which they hold. The result, whatever it might be, would no longer be experimental, for the people would feel assured that a change of administration would not imperil the peace and unity of the nation.

DEMOCRACY, THE STATE RIGHTS PARTY.

For the past forty years, the Democratic party has been controlled by men who accepted the fatal doctrine of State Rights, as preached by John C. Calhoun, as the basis of our Federal Union.

Under this doctrine, the State was held to be supreme. The Union was regarded as a mere arrangement for convenience, to be cast aside, whenever it suited the pleasure or interest of a State to so decide.

A State could obey or disobey the laws of the nation, just as it saw fit. The voice of a State convention, could, under this doctrine, place the State outside of the national authority. It was held by the advocates of this State Rights doctrine, that a State, entering the Union of its own free will, could withdraw with equal freedom. In other words one party to a contract, could break it at his pleasure, because he entered it of his own free will.

The fatal heresy of State Rights ought to have died with the Rebellion. The Southern Confederacy illustrated its full power, and with its overthrow the doctrine should have been buried from sight forever.

If Northern Democracy had been free from its influence, this would have been the case, but it retained the old poison in its system. It has never been free from it, and to-day, united with the Bourbon Democracy of the South, it is under the control of Calhounism, and liable, if entrusted with power, to again plunge the country, on some slight pretext, into troubles even greater than those hitherto endured.

THE DEMOCRATIC RECORD BEFORE THE WAR.

Through Democracy, the South, prior to the war, practically controlled the government. It shaped the affairs of the nation to suit its own interest. It filled its important offices at home and abroad. It gave direction to national legislation; it created the policy of the government, and when it could no longer govern, it endeavored to destroy. This statement is a correct one. It has passed into history and cannot be refuted.

Alexander H. Stephens who afterward became the Vice President of the Southern Confederacy, delivered a speech against the policy of secession, before the State Convention of Georgia, January, 1861. He said:

"We have always had the control of it, and can yet, if we remain in it, and are as united as we have been. We have had a majority of the Presidents chosen from the South, as well as the control and management of those chosen from the North. We have had sixty years of Southern Presidents to their twenty-four, thus controlling the Executive Department. So, of the judges of the Supreme Court, we have had eighteen from the South, and but eleven from the North: although nearly four-fifths of the judicial business has arisen in the Free States, yet a majority of the Court has always been from the South. This we have required so as to guard against any interpretation of the Constitution unfavorable to us. In like manner we have been equally watchful to guard our interests in the Legislative branch of Government. In choosing the presiding Presidents (pro tem) of the Senate, we have had twenty-four to their eleven. Speakers of the House, we have had twenty-three, and they twelve. While the majority of the Representatives, from their greater population, have always been from the North, yet we have generally secured the Speaker, because he to a great extent, shapes and controls the Legislation of the country. Nor have we had less control in every other Department of the General Government. Attorney Generals we have had fourteen, while the North have had but five. Foreign Ministers, we have had eighty-six and they but fifty-four. While three-fourths of the business which demands diplomatic agents abroad is clearly from the Free States, from their greater commercial interests, yet we have had the principal embassies so as to secure the world-markets for our cotton, tobacco, and sugar on the best possible terms. We have had a vast majority of the higher officers of both army and navy, while a larger portion of the soldiers and sailors were drawn from the North. Equally so of clerks, auditors, and comptrollers filling the Executive Department, the records show for the last fifty years that of the three thousand thus employed, we have had more than two-thirds of the same, while we have had but one-third of the white population of the Republic.

"Again, look at another item, and one, be assured, in which we have a great and vital interest: it is that of revenue, or means of supporting Government. From official documents, we learn that a fraction over three-fourths of the revenue collected for the support of Government, has uniformly been raised from the North.

"The expense for the transportation of the mail in the free States was, by the report of the Postmaster-General for the year 1860, a little over $3,000,000, while the income was 19,000,000. But in the slave States the transportation of the mail was $14,716,000, while the revenue from the same was $3,001,26, leaving a deficit of $5,704,974, to be applied by the North for our accommodation, and without it we must have been entirely cut off from this most essential branch of the Government."

This, be it remembered, is not the language of a Republican trying to paint a picture for party effect, but the words of the Vice-president of the late Confederacy, who will be accepted as good authority by the most ardent Democrat.

The statement shows clearly:

1st. That the Democratic party before the war was under the control of the South, and used its power to promote Southern interests and ambition at the expense of the North.

2d. It shows that the South had no justification for its attempt to withdraw from the Union.

3d. It proves the fallacy of its pretensions, that it was driven into rebellion by Northern aggression.

4th. It clearly indicates the treasonable course of the party that preferred to break up a Government that it could no longer control, rather than submit to constitutional authority.

5th. It foreshadows the ascendancy of Southern influence in all departments of the Government under Democratic restoration.

The statement made by Mr. Stephens must convince all who are open to conviction, that the Southern States had no just cause for complaint. The defeat of the State Rights party, and through this defeat, the loss of the controlling power, were the causes which brought about secession.

Long before the election of Abraham Lincoln, the Democratic threat had been made both in the North and the South, that the slave States would not submit to a Republican President. The threat was general throughout the South, and was repeated by Northern leaders on the stump, and by the Democratic press, without a word of protest or condemnation. On the contrary, every encouragement was held out, that the Democrats of the North would not only endorse the threat of secession, but lend material aid in carrying it out.

In December, 1860, Mr. Gregg, one of the delegates to the South Carolina Convention, said:

"If we wish to find the immediate cause of the secession of South Carolina, the immediate cause of all is the election of Abraham Lincoln."

In the same convention Mr. Dargan said:

"It is not true, in point of fact, that all the Northern people are hostile to the rights of the South. We have a Spartan band in every Northern State. It is due to them they should know the reasons which influence us. According to our apprehension, the necessity which exists for our immediate withdrawal from association with the Northern States is that this hostile abolition party have the control of the Government."

In November, 1860, Mr. Lawrence M. Keitt delivered a speech in Charleston, S. C. He said, in answer to an assertion that any attempt to withdraw from the Union would be met with force:

"Let me tell you, there are a million of Democrats in the North, who, when the Black Republicans attempt to march upon the South, will be found a wall of fire in the front." (Cries of "That's so!" and applause.)

This was the feeling through the entire South. Democracy had been regarded as the State Rights party, and it was believed that any attempt to interfere with a State in its withdrawal from the Union, would unite Northern Democrats in armed opposition to it. This belief was encouraged by prominent leaders of the Northern wing of the party.

An extract from a letter written January 6, 1850, by ex-President Pierce to Jefferson Davis, and found in Davis's home, in Missisissippi, when taken by our troops, reveals the grounds of the belief so confidently expressed by leading Southerners, that Democracy would be a unit in their favor, in case a rebellion should be inaugurated.

After referring to political matters, and expressing a desire to have Mr. Davis the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, the ex-President says:

"Let me suggest that, in the running debates in Congress, full justice seems to me not to have been done to the Democracy of the North. I do not believe that our friends at the South have any just idea of the state of feeling, hurrying at this moment to the pitch of intense exasperation, between those who respect their political obligations, and those who have apparently no impelling power but that which fanatical passion on the subject of domestic slavery imparts. Without discussing the question of right, of abstract power to secede, I have never believed that actual disruption of the Union can occur without blood; and if, through the madness of Northern abolitionism, that dire calamity must come, the fighting will not be along Mason's and Dixon's line mere y. It will be within our own borders—in our own streets—between the two classes of citizens to whom I have referred."

Is it to be wondered at, that such assurance from so distinguished a Democrat as ex-President Pierce, and repeated in private letters, and public speeches by others of equal prominence, should leave the impression upon the Southern mind that armed hostility against the Government, on the part of the South, would receive the active sympathy of Northern Democracy.

In January, 1861, Fernando Wood, then Mayor of New York city, sent a message to the common council, recommending the withdrawal of the city from the State. He favored "a free city," as he termed it, and his scheme met with approval from many leading Democrats.

About the same time, (January 16) as it was a part of the Democratic programme, a meeting of Democrats was held in National Hall, Philadelphia. At this meeting a resolution was adopted favoring the withdrawal of Pennsylvania from the Union, and expressing sentiments in keeping with those of the South.

It is well known that leading Democrats of the North conspired in the spring of 1861, to carry their respective States out of the Union. Ex-Governor Price, of New Jersey, in a letter to L. W. Burnet, of Newark, N. J., said:

"I believe the Southern Confederation permanent. The proceeding has been taken with forethought and deliberation—it is no hurried impulse, but an irrevocable act, based upon the sacred, as was supposed, 'equality of the States,' and in my opinion, every slave State will, in a short period of time, be found united in one confederacy. * * * * What position for New Jersey will best accord with her interests, honor, and the patriotic instincts of her people? I say emphatically she should go with the South, from every wise, prudential, and patriotic reason."

In this letter, the ex Governor also gives it as his opinion that New York and Pennsylvania will "choose also to cast their lot with the South," and after them, the Western and Northwestern States.

If necessary, a volume could be filled with unimpeachable evidence, tending to prove that the Southern people were misled by Democratic leaders, North and South. In the fall and winter of 1860 and the spring of 1861, the air was filled with Democratic threats and promises. Incendiary speeches were made, secret caucuses held at the national capital. The highest Government officials—all Democrats—conspired with the public enemies. Even President Buchanan, although he declared that "the election of any one of our fellow citizens to the office of President, does not of itself afford just cause for dissolving the Union," gave his official encouragement to the dissolution, by stating in his last annual message, December 4, 1860:

"After much serious reflection, I have arrived at the conclusion that the Constitution has not delegated to Congress nor to any other department of the Federal Government the power to coerce a State into submission which is attempting to withdraw or has actually withdrawn from the Confederacy."

At an earlier date, Nov. 20, 1860, Attorney General Black had given his opinion to the same effect. According to his view the government could act only on the defensive. It could repel an attack, but it had no constitutional right to assert its authority or protect itself by any offensive measures. In his own language: "The Union must utterly perish at the moment when Congress shall arm one part of the people against another for any purpose beyond that of merely protecting the General Government in the exercise of its proper constitutional functions."

If we need more convincing proof of Democratic encouragement of the Southern rebellion, than what has already been presented, it may be found in the deliberate transfer of arms from Northern to Southern arsenals, by order of a Democratic Secretary of War, (Mr. Floyd.)

From a report made by Mr. B. Stanton, from the Committee on Military Affairs in

House of Representatives, February 18, 1861, it is shown that in the spring of 1860 the following transfers of muskets were made from the Springfield armory, and the Watertown and Watervleit arsenals:

Where Sent.	Percussion Muskets.	Altered Muskets.	Rifles.
To Charleston Arsenal	9,280	5,720	2,000
To North Carolina Arsenal	15,480	9,520	2,000
To Augusta Arsenal..	12,380	7,620	2,000
To Mount Vernon Arsenal....	9,280	5,720	2,000
To Baton Rouge Arsenal	18,580	11,420	2,000
Total	65,000	40,000	10,000

All these arms fell into the possession of the Confederate authorities, as it was known they would by the Democratic Secretary of War when he ordered the transfer.

It was also shown in the same report that the Secretary of War ordered the transfer of forty columbiads and four thirty-two pounders, to unfinished forts on Ship Island on the coast of Mississippi, and seventy columbiads and seven thirty-two pounders to be sent to Galveston, Texas, where the fort to receive them had just been commenced. So clear was the evidence that these heavy guns were intended for the use of the rebels that a monster mass meeting was held at Allegheny, Pa., the place where the Arsenal containing them was located, and a protest was entered against their removal. Through the action of Judge Holt, the present Judge Advocate General, the transfer of the guns was prevented.

In addition to the arms sent South by a Democratic Secretary of War, upwards of 50,000 muskets were sold by the Government to parties representing Southern interests. These muskets were in good condition, and yet were sold for $2.50. Add to the number transferred and sold, the annual quota distributed to the Southern States for 1861, in advance, and it will be found that not less than 300,000 muskets were placed in the hands of secessionists by the direct order of a Democratic Secretary of War. This is what the Mobile Advertiser said at the time:

"During the past year 135,430 muskets have been quietly transferred from the Northern arsenal at Springfield alone, to those in the Southern States. We are much obliged to Secretary Floyd for the foresight he has thus displayed in disarming the North and equipping the South for this emergency. There is no telling the quantity of arms and munitions which were sent South from other Northern arsenals. There is no doubt but that every man in the South who can carry a gun can now be supplied from private or public sources. The Springfield contribution alone would arm all the militiamen of Alabama and Mississippi."

Can any sane man doubt the effect of such encouragement, coming from the highest representatives of the Democratic party, upon an excited people? Is it surprising that the demagogues who fired the Southern heart gave prominence to the pledge so often made, that the Democracy of the North would stand by the South in its armed resistance to Federal authority? Yet this is the party that now demands control of the Government; and some of the very men who led it then are leaders now. They hold the same views of Federal power; they endorse the same fatal doctrine of State Rights; if entrusted with power they would encourage, as they did in 1860, the disruption of the Union. Can the nation trust this party? Can it risk its future peace and prosperity in its hands? These are questions of vital importance, and no good citizen can avoid the responsibility involved in their answer.

THE DEMOCRATIC RECORD DURING THE WAR.
From the record thus far presented the following deductions are made:

1. The Democratic party, as the State Rights party, educated its followers to believe in the right of a State to withdraw from the Union at its pleasure.
2. It took no steps to counteract the fatal tendency of this doctrine when it assumed the form of open resistance to the Federal authority.
3. It had control of the Government when the secession movement developed its purpose to establish a Southern Confederacy, and instead of promptly checking it, it vitalized it, by giving it official encouragement.
4. The Democratic party, through its leading officials, not only encouraged secession by friendly expressions, but with a full knowledge of its hostile intentions, deliberately furnished its advocates with arms and munitions of war belonging to the Federal Government.
5. Judged by its record; the sympathy expressed; the promises given; the material aid rendered; the unanimous action of its Southern wing, the Democratic party stands responsible for the Slaveholders' Rebellion.

Democratic encouragement having made the rebellion possible, what was its policy during the war? Did it endeavor to undo the great wrong which it had committed, by promptly responding to the calls made upon the patriotism of the nation? As a party it did not. There were noble men who proclaimed themselves war Democrats, who responded with alacrity to the defense of the Government. They laid aside the partizan and became patriots, and by their sacrifices made good their early professions of fidelity to the Union and the Constitution.

But the Democratic party as a political organization was hostile to the Government and the efforts put forth for the suppression of the rebellion. Its mass meetings, its party caucuses, the correspondence of its leaders, the riots incited by its followers, its attitude in the elections, its undisguised expressions in Congress, its encouragement of desertion, and defense of those who were arrested for treasonable conduct, its continual clamors for peace in the face of the enemy, all go to prove that its sympathies were with the Southern Confederacy and against the cause of the Union.

On the 9th of January, 1861, Mr. Howard, of Michigan, offered, in the House of Representatives, a resolution calling for the appointment of a committee to enquire—

1. Whether any executive officer of the United States was treating with any person or persons for the surrender of the forts or other public property of the United States.

2. Whether any officer of the Government had entered into any pledge, agreement or understanding, with any person or persons not to send reinforcements to the forts in Charleston Harbor.

3. What demand had been made for reinforcements and why they had not been sent.

4. Where the ships of the Navy were stationed.

5. What public property had been seized, and the particulars of such seizure.

6. What naval vessels had been seized, and whether any efforts had been made to protect or recover them.

These simple precautionary resolutions, intended to inform the Government of the extent of the danger, although adopted by the House, received only 17 Democratic votes, out of the 133 yeas. 60 Democrats voted against it.

On the 11th February, 1861, on the bill providing for the construction of war vessels, the vote in the Senate stood 30 yeas to 18 nays—all Democrats in the negative. In the House, on the 20th, the vote stood 114 yeas to 38 nays, only 12 Democrats voting in its favor.

Lieut.-General Scott, apprehensive of an attack upon the Capital, had ordered seven companies of artillery, and one company of sappers and miners, of the regular army; to be quartered at Washington.

February 14, 1861. Mr. Branch, of North Carolina, introduced a resolution, declaring the presence of these troops offensive and insulting, and demanding their immediate withdrawal.

This resolution was laid on the table, by a vote of 125 to 35. Thirteen Democrats voted in favor of the motion to 35 against it.

February 21, 1861. A resolution was introduced by Mr. Dawes, censuring the Secretary of the Navy for sending to distant seas all the available ships of the Navy at so critical a period, when their presence was needed at home; also for accepting the resignations of officers who were in arms against the Government. The report accompanying the resolution says:

“That the entire naval force available for the defence of the whole Atlantic coast at the time of the appointment of this committee, consisted of the steamer Brooklyn, twenty-five guns, and the Store Ship Relief, two guns; while the former was of too great draught to permit her to enter Charleston Harbor with safety, except at spring-tides, and the latter was under orders to the coast of Africa, with stores for the African Squadron. Thus the whole Atlantic seaboard has been to all intents and purposes without defence during all the period of civil commotion and lawless violence to which the President has called our attention as ‘of such vast and alarming proportions’ as to be beyond his power to check or control.”

Yet a resolution to censure so clear a betrayal of the public safety, and one that ought to have received the vote of every true man, received only one Democratic vote out of the 95 cast in its favor. Fifty-six Democrats voted against it.

July 9, 1861. Mr. Lovejoy offered in the House the following resolution: “That in the judgment of the House, it is no part of the duty of the soldiers of the United States to capture and return fugitive slaves.” The vote was, yeas 92, nays 55, not a Democrat voting in its favor.

July 15, 1861. Mr. Benjamin Wood offered in the House a resolution recommending the several States to convene their Legislatures for the purpose of appointing delegates to a general convention to devise measures of peace. Although this proposition was offered a few days after the Federal army had been defeated at Bull Run, it received the entire Democratic vote with the exception of one, who voted with the 93 Republicans against the resolution.

July 29, 1861. Mr. Cox offered a resolution, providing for the appointment of commissioners, empowering them to request from the Confederate States a like commission, the two bodies to meet and confer on such measures as may be deemed necessary “to assuage all grievances,” said Commissioners to meet at Louisville on the 1st Monday in September, and in conjunction with a committee of one from each State, appointed by the House, consider such amendments to the Constitution as might tend to restore peace. Although the war was in full operation, and the South confident of success, this resolution commanded 41 Democratic votes—only two Democrats voting with the 83 Republicans against it. The vote stood 41 yeas, 85 nays.

August 2, 1861. On a bill to seize and appropriate the property of those in rebellion against the United States, and for the more effective suppression of the Rebellion, the vote stood yeas 61, nays 48, only two Democrats voting in its favor.

August 5, 1861. Mr. Calvert offered a resolution for the appointment of a committee of nine to consider and report upon amendments to the Constitution, necessary to secure peace. The vote stood 39 yeas, 72 nays, only one Democrat voting against it.

August 5, 1861. A bill was introduced in the House, approving of, and legalizing the acts of President Lincoln, in calling out the militia and strengthening the army and navy. Out of 74 votes in its favor only three were Democrats. The 19 voting against it were Democrats.

December 10, 1861. Mr. Julian offered a resolution, instructing the judiciary committee to report a bill, so amending the fugitive slave law, as to forbid the recapture or return of any fugitive from labor without satisfactory proof that the claimant of such fugitive was loyal to the Government. The resolution was passed, yeas 78, nays 39, not a Democrat voting in its favor.

February 6, 1862. The House voted on the proposition for the issue of $150,000,000 in Treasury notes, known as "legal tenders," also for the issue of $50,000,000 in bonds. The vote was, in favor of the measure, 95, against it 60, only six Democrats voting in its favor.

February 25, 1862. The new article of war, prohibiting military or naval officers from employing any of their forces to capture or return into slavery any fugitive from service or labor, passed the House. Yeas, 95; nays, 51, only one Democrat voting in its favor.

April 3, 1862. A bill for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia passed the Senate, by a vote of 29 to 14, not a Democrat voting in its favor.

April 11, 1862, it passed the House by a vote of 92 to 39, only five Democrats voting in its favor.

May 12, 1862. A bill passed the House prohibiting slavery in the Territories of the United States. The vote stood, yeas 85, nays 50, only one Democrat voting in its favor.

June 9, 1862. Mr. Colfax introduced a resolution, instructing the Judiciary committee to report a bill giving the right of trial by jury to all Fugitives who deny under oath that they were slaves; also requiring proof of loyalty on the part of the claimant. Adopted by yeas 77, nays 42, only two Democrats voting in its favor.

July 11, 1862. A bill was passed by the house; to "suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes." The vote stood, yeas 81, nays 42, not a Democrat voting in its favor.

July 16, 1862. A bill authorizing the President to receive into the United States service, persons of African descent, for the purpose of constructing intrenchments, performing camp service, and doing such military or naval service as they might be found competent to perform, was passed by the House, yeas 77, nays 30, only 4 Democrats voting in its favor.

Dec. 11, 1862. Mr. Yeaman, of Kentucky, offered a resolution, declaring that the Emancipation Proclamation of the President was not warranted by the Constitution—that the policy of Emancipation was dangerous to the rights of citizens and to the perpetuity of a free people. The vote on this was: In favor 47, against it 95, only 3 Democrats voting against it.

Dec. 15, 1862. A resolution was introduced by Mr. S. C. Fessenden in the House, endorsing the President's emancipation proclamation as a war measure, as an exercise of power with proper regard for the rights of the States and the perpetuity of free government. The vote stood, yeas 78, nays 52, only two Democrats voting in its favor.

Jan. 28, 1863. Mr. Davis introduced a proviso to be added to a pending bill: "That no part of the sums appropriated by his act shall be disbursed for the pay, subsistence or any other supplies of any negro, free or slave, in the armed military service of the United States." Eight Democrats voted in its favor, 28 Republicans against. A strict party vote.

February 20, 1863. The important measure, known as "The National Currency Act, of 1863," passed the House by a vote of 78 yeas to 64 nays; only three Democrats voting in its favor. Under this act our present National Currency took the place of the defective currency issued under the old state bank system. The currency act of 1864, which passed the House April 18, was also opposed by the Democrats, the vote standing in its favor 80, to 66 against it, not a Democrat voting in its favor.

Dec. 14, 1863. Mr. Fernando Wood offered a resolution requesting the President to appoint three commissioners to negotiate with the authorities at Richmond, "to the end that this bloody, destructive and inhuman war shall cease."

Although no desire had been expressed on the part of the South for such a conference, this resolution was supported by 59 Democrats, 9 Republicans and 6 Democrats voted against it.

Dec. 17, 1863. Mr. Green Clay Smith offered a resolution in favor of "a vigorous prosecution of the war until the Constitution and law shall be enforced and obeyed in all parts of the United States," opposing any armistice or intervention "so long as there shall be found a rebel in arms against the Government," and ignoring "all party names, lines, and issues" until the authority of the Government was re established. This was passed by a vote of 94 yeas, 65 nays, only four Democrats voting in its favor.

Dec. 17, 1863. Mr. Edgerton offered a resolution denouncing "as among the gravest of crimes, the invasion or occupation by armed force, of any State, under the pretext or for the purpose of coercing the people thereof to modify or abrogate any of their laws or domestic institutions that are consistent with the Constitution of the United States." Although the laws and the institutions of the Confederate States were being used to destroy the Federal Government, this resolution was not opposed by a single Democrat. The vote stood: In its favor 66, against it 90, a strict party vote.

Dec. 21, 1863. Mr. Harding offered an amendment to the deficiency bill that no moneys appropriated should be used for the raising, arming, equipping or paying of negroes. It was favored by 41 Democrats, the vote standing, yeas 41, nays 105.

Jan. 18, 1864. The joint resolution, pending in the House, dropping from the rolls of the Army all volunteer officers who were absent from duty, except for good cause, and intended to weed out of the service those useless officers who drew pay without performing service, was agreed to, by a vote of 72 to 45. This resolution had for its object the improvement of the service, yet not a Democrat voted in its favor.

Feb. 1, 1864. A resolution was introduced by Mr. Eldridge opposing the system of drafting, declaring it a failure and repealing all acts authorizing drafts. The House rejected the measure, 42 voting in its favor and 84 against. All those voting in its favor were Democrats. Only three Democrats voted against it.

Feb. 1, 1864. A resolution favoring a more vigorous policy in the enlistment of negroes, to relieve thereby the burdens resting upon the white soldiers, was passed, by a vote of, yeas 80, nays 46. All Democrats in the negative.

Feb. 12, 1864. An amendment to the Supplementary Enrollment bill providing for enrollment of colored persons passed the House. The vote stood, 84 yeas to 71 nays. Not a Democrat voted in its favor.

It is a noticeable fact, that at the very time when negroes were being employed by the rebel army, and their enrollment sanctioned by confederate legislation, the Democrats of the North were united in opposition to such a policy on the part of the Federal Government.

The bill as amended, passed by a vote of 94 yeas to 65 nays, only five Democrats voting in its favor on the final passage.

Feb. 15, 1864. Mr. Arnold offered a resolution: "That the Constitution be so amended as to abolish slavery in the United States, wherever it now exists, and to prohibit its existence in every part thereof forever." This resolution was passed by a vote of 78 to 62, only one Democrat favoring it.

March 17, 1864. On a bill before the House to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company of the District of Columbia, the proviso: "That there shall be no regulation excluding any person from any car on account of color," was agreed to, yeas 76, nays 62, not a Democrat voting for it.

March 21, 1864. Pending the Army appropriation bill the proviso was offered: "That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be applied or used for the purpose of raising, arming, equipping or paying negro soldiers."

This was favored by 18 Democrats, opposed by 8 Democrats, and 74 Republicans.

April 6, 1864. A vote was taken in the House on a section of the currency bill, authorizing the issue to National Banks of small notes. The vote stood, yeas 76, nays 54, only four Democrats voting in its favor.

April 9, 1864. A resolution was introduced in the House by Mr. Colfax, declaring Alexander Long unworthy to be a member, said Long having favored upon the floor, the recognition of the independence of the Southern Confederacy. The vote on this stood, yeas 80, nays 70, only one Democrat voting in its favor. On the same day Mr. Washburn offered a resolution for the expulsion of Benjamin G. Harris for the following language: "The South asked you to let them go in peace. But no; you said you would bring them into subjection. That is not done yet, and God Almighty grant that it never may be. I hope that you will never subjugate the South." The vote stood, yeas 84, nays 58, only one Democrat voting in its favor. The resolution requiring a two-thirds vote, it was lost. Mr. Schenck then offered a resolution of censure, the vote on this standing yeas 98, nays 20, seventeen Democrats voting in favor of it, and twenty-one refusing to vote.

April 16, 1864. A bill passed the House preventing States from taxing the capital stock of National Banks at a higher rate than an equal amount of capital in the hands of individual citizens, also preventing the taxation by States of the capital invested in U. S. Bonds for deposit on circulation. The vote stood 70 yeas to 60 nays, only two Democrats voting in its favor.

April 30, 1864. A bill increasing soldiers pay, and giving bounty to colored soldiers, passed the House by a vote of 80 yeas to 51 nays, only two Democrats voting in its favor. All Democrats against it.

June 6, 1864. A bill for the punishment of guerrillas, passed the House, yeas 72, nays 37, only two Democrats voting in its favor.

June 13, 1864. The House passed the bill for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave law. The vote stood, yeas 90, nays 62, only one Democrat voting in favor of this most righteous measure.

June 18, 1864. Pending the consideration of the loan bill Mr. Holman moved to add this proviso: "That nothing in this act shall impair the right of the States to tax the bonds, notes, and other obligations issued under this Act." It was rejected by a vote of 71 to 77, not a Democrat voting against it.

June 19, 1864. The following proviso to the civil appropriation bill pending in the House: "That in the Courts of the United States there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color" was adopted, yeas 68, nays 48, not a Democrat voting in its favor.

July 2, 1864. One of the most important military bills of the war passed the House. It provided for the raising of additional troops either by volunteer enlistment or by drafting. The President under this Act, called for 500,000 men for one year, July 18, 1864. Vital as were the provisions of this bill for the success of our cause, the vote stood, yeas 66, nays 51, not a Democrat voting in its favor.

July 4, 1864. The special war income tax of 5 per cent on all incomes over $600 a year was adopted by the House, by a vote of 53 yeas to 49 nays, not a Democrat voting in its favor. It passed the Senate on the same day by a vote of 28 to 7, only one Democrat voting for it.

Jan. 9, 1865. A joint resolution passed the House declaring that the wife and children of any person mustered into the United States service shall be forever free, any law, usage, or custom whatsoever to the contrary notwithstanding. The vote stood, 74 yeas to 63 nays, not a Democrat voting in its favor.

Jan. 16, 1865. Mr. Cox offered a resolution, that the President be requested to send commissioners to the Confederate authorities "with a view to national pacification and tranquility" "although we do not know that the insurgents are yet prepared to agree to any terms of pacification which we would or should deem acceptable." The vote on this stood, yeas 51, nays 84, only two Democrats voting against it.

A similar resolution was introduced by Mr. Dawson, Feb. 13, 1865, and laid upon the table by a vote of 73 to 47, only one Democrat voting with the 72 Republicans in favor of tabling the resolution.

Jan. 31, 1865. The joint resolution, proposing an amendment to the Constitution for the extinction of slavery throughout the United States, and requiring a two-thirds vote for its passage, passed the House, by the following vote, yeas 119, nays 56, only sixteen Democrats voting in its favor.

February 27, 1865, an amendment was offered to a pending military bill, repealing all acts or parts of acts authorizing conscription. This was favored by 27 Democrats, and opposed by only ten; 84 Republicans voting against it.

The Enrollment Act of March 3, 1865, containing important provisions for strengthening the Army, passed the House by a vote of 72 to 56, only five Democrats voting in its favor.

March 3, 1865, a bill for the establishment of the Freedman's bureau, to have the general superintendence of all freedmen; to watch over the execution of all laws, proclamations and military orders of emancipation, and to establish necessary regulations for their protection, was passed by the House by a vote of 77 yeas, to 52 nays, only one Democrat voting for it.

March 3, 1865, Mr. Schenck from the military Committee reported a resolution for the revocation of the Military order which required all colored persons leaving Washington to procure passes. The vote stood, yeas 75, nays 24, only 4 Democrats voting for it.

Thus the record might be continued with the votes on other measures of equal importance.

The public acts to which reference has been made, and the votes thereon, are but a few of the many that could be shown proving the deep rooted Democratic sympathy for the Confederate cause, and the organized opposition of the party to measures absolutely essential to the successful prosecution of the war. Can any impartial mind in the review of the votes presented, be brought to believe that a Democratic majority in Congress would have ever secured the preservation of the Union. To the strong Republican majorities, representing the national will, and the determination of the loyal people to maintain without compromise or dishonor the unity and integrity of the Republic, we owe the existence of the Government. This much at least the impartial historian will accord to the Republican party, and its patriotic record when the political history of the Rebellion is truthfully written.

From the record presented three conclusions may be fairly drawn.

1. The encouragement which the Democratic party gave to the secession conspirators before the war, lost none of its force during its prosecution.

2. The attitude of the Democratic party if not openly hostile to the Union cause was far from friendly to it.

3. If the policy of the Democratic party, as foreshadowed by its votes in Congress, had prevailed, the Southern Confederacy would be to-day an established fact.

Would the restoration of such a party to power be conducive to the interest of the nation? Would not the future peace and prosperity of the Republic be endangered by Democratic ascendancy? Would not the organized opposition to the enactment of those measures which are now the laws of the land, find expression in a failure to execute or administer them? In a word, would not the restoration of the Democratic party to the control of the Nation, be the restoration of that political power which encouraged the South to secede, and discouraged by vote and example the efforts of a loyal people to suppress the rebellion and preserve the Union? These are questions for the people to answer at the ballot-box. They will then and there resolve themselves into a single question: "Shall those who were the enemies of the nation in time of war, be chosen by the people as their trusted guardians in time of peace?"

DEMOCRATIC POLICY WOULD HAVE LED TO CONFEDERATE RECOGNITION.

It has been shown by the record submitted, that Democracy encouraged the rebellion, and opposed those efforts which were deemed necessary for its suppression.

It may be urged by its leaders to-day, that it was in favor of suppressing the rebellion, and that its opposition was not to the Union, but to the means employed to save it. Whatever its purpose may have been, it is certain that the effect of its opposition to the means employed tended to prolong the war, by holding out the hope to those in rebellion that peace would be obtained through the recognition of the Southern Confederacy.

When the Southern States seceded, they did so with the determination never to return to the Union. If the history of the movement is clearer on one point than another, it is on this resolution of the seceded States never to submit to Federal authority. An independent Southern Confederacy was the only ultimatum which the South had to offer as a basis of peace. The official and private correspondence received from the South; the speeches of its leaders and the language of its press; the debates in State legislatures and in the Confederate Congress; the informal conferences held from time to time; the proclamations and messages of its President, all go to prove, that, from the inception to the close of the movement, peace was not desirable, except on the basis of a recognition of the Southern Confederacy. Yet, with a full knowledge of this fact, Democracy, throughout the war, kept clamoring for a peace which its leaders knew could not be had, and for a peaceful settlement of existing difficulties, which they knew to be impossible.

In April, 1861, Roger A. Pryor, of Virginia, said, in response to a serenade, at Charleston, South Carolina:

"Gentlemen, I thank you, especially that you have at last annihilated this accursed Union, reeking with corruption and insolent with excess of tyranny. Thank God! it is at last blasted and riven by the lightning wrath of an outraged and indignant people. Not only is it gone, but gone forever. In the expressive language of Scripture, it is water spilt upon the ground which cannot be gathered up. Like Lucifer, son of the morning, it has fallen, never to rise again. For my part, gentlemen, if Abraham Lincoln and Hannibal Hamlin, to-morrow, were to abdicate their offices and were to give me a blank sheet of paper to write the condition of re-annexation to the defunct Union, I would scornfully spurn the overture."

These sentiments were received with tumultuous applause and wild enthusiasm, and, as subsequent events showed, truthfully represented the prevailing opinion at the South. Yet, in the face of these positive expressions, while the life of the nation trembled in the balance, Democracy devoted its energies to the discussion of the Constitutional rights of those who were leading armies against the Government, and in demanding for rebels in arms the same mild treatment accorded to law-abiding citizens. Is it any wonder that the loyal people distrusted Democracy, and that the Confederates regarded it as a Northern ally, whose triumph meant Southern independence.

Reference to letters written by Southern leaders, and to the debates in the rebel Congress, and the editorials in the Southern press, strengthen the statement that the forlorn hope of the Southern Confederacy centered in the restoration to power of the Democratic party.

In the winter of 1862, (Dec. 24,) George N. Sanders wrote a letter to certain prominent New York Democrats. The letter was headed :

"Governor Seymour, Dean Richmond, John Van Buren, Charles O'Connor, Washington Hunt, Fernando Wood, and James Brooks, representative men of the triumphant revolutionary party of New York."

In his letter he said :

"Let heart and brain into the revolution ; accelerate and direct the movement, get rid of the Baboon, (or What is it!) Abraham Lincoln, pacifically, if you can, but by the blood of his followers if necessary. Withdraw your support, material and moral, from the invading armies, and the South will make quick work with the Abolitionists that remain on her soil. Suffer no degenerate son of the South, upon however plausible pretext, to idly embarrass your action by throwing into your way rotten planks of reconstruction. Unity is no longer possible. The very word Union, once so dear, has been made the cover for so many atrocious acts that the mere mention of it is odious in the ears of Southern people. The State legislatures will be called upon to obliterate the hated name from the counties and towns."

This was the response of the South to the Democratic triumphs throughout the North in November, 1862. How faithfully these "representative men of the triumphant revolutionary party of New York," endeavored to carry out the plan suggested by Mr. Sanders, may be understood by consulting their record, and noting their persistent opposition to the efforts of the Government to suppress the rebellion.

After the Democratic successes in the fall of 1862, Southern papers took occasion to assure the North that there could be no peace except by recognizing the Confederacy.

The Richmond Examiner said :

"They do not yet understand that we are resolute to be rid of them forever, and determined rather to die than to live with them in the same political community again."

The Richmond Dispatch, anticipating a Democratic majority in Congress as a result of the elections, said :

"It is probable, that they might propose a reconstruction of the Union, with certain pledges, guarantees, &c. To this the South will never consent. They will never exist in the same political association, be its name what it may, be its terms what they will, and be the guarantees whatever the good will of the Democrats may make them. We of the Confederate States have made up our minds to endure the worst extremity to which war can reduce a people. We are prepared for it. The Government that should propose to reunite us with the Yankees could not exist a day. It would sink so deep beneath the deluge of popular indignation that even history would not be able to fish up the wreck."

Again, on the 18th of October, the same paper said :

"Nor, after the sacrifices which the South has suffered at Northern hands, could she ever consent, of her own free will, to live under the same Government with that people."

In December (2) 1862, the Legislature of North Carolina, as if fearful that Northern Democracy would insist upon the Southern States coming back on their own terms, passed this resolution:

"Resolved : That the separation between the Confederate States and the United States is final, and that the people of North Carolina will never consent to a reunion at any time or upon any terms."

December 8, 1862. Governor Letcher, of Virginia wrote :

"Let it be understood that the separation is and ought to be final and irrevocable; that Virginia will under no circumstances entertain any proposition from any quarter which may have for its object a restoration or reconstruction of the late Union, on any terms or conditions whatever."

In a speech delivered at Richmond, and reported in the Enquirer of January 7, 1863, President Davis said :

"By showing themselves so utterly disgraced that if the question was proposed to you whether you would combine with Hyenas or Yankees, I trust every Virginian would say, give me the Hyenas."

The Dispatch of January 11, 1863, said :

"We warn the Democrats and Conservatives of the North to dismiss from their minds at once the miserable delusion that the South can ever consent to enter again, upon any terms, the old Union. If the North will allow us to write the Constitution ourselves, and give us every guarantee we would ask, we would sooner be under the Government of England or France than under a Union with men who have shown that they cannot keep good faith, and are the most barbarous and inhuman, as well as treacherous of mankind."

The Richmond Sentinel thus replies to the address of New Hampshire Democrats, declaring that if the South would "come back into the Union, the Democracy of the North will do all in their power to gain for them (the Southern States) such guarantees as will secure their safety."

"Do the New Hampshire Democrats suppose for one moment that we could so much as think of reunion with such a people? Rather tell one to be wedded to a corpse! Rather join hands with a fiend from the pit. When those in the United States who are disposed to deal fairly with us shall gain the rule, we may in time begin to bury the many bitter memories which now add energy to our resentment, and make with them treaties that shall be mutually advantageous. Perhaps, hereafter, good will may be revived again. But Union—never let it be mentioned! It is impossible.”

The Richmond Enquirer of October 16, 1863, said:

“What we mean to win is utter separation from them for all time. We do not want to govern their country; but after levying upon it what seemeth good to us, by way of indemnity, we leave it to commence its political life again from the beginning, hoping that the lesson may have made them sadder and wiser Yankees. We shut them out forever, with all their unclean and scoundrelly ways, intending to lead our lives here in our own confederate way, within our own well-guarded bounds, and without, as St. John says, “without are dogs.”

September 28, 1863, a resolution was introduced into the Virginia house of delegates for inquiring into the tone and temper of the people of the United States on the subject of peace, with a view to responding, if favorable. The Sentinel, of the 29th, in speaking of it, said:

“The House, by a unanimous vote, put its foot on the resolution, without a word of discussion, or a moment of delay. In this it but fairly represented the manliness and unanimity of our people.”

In 1864, Henry W. Allen, Governor of Louisiana, said in his inaugural:

“I speak to-day by authority. I speak as the Governor of Louisiana, and I wish it to be known at Washington, and elsewhere, that rather than reconstruct this Government and go back to the Union, on any terms whatever, the people of Louisiana will, in convention assembled without a dissenting voice, cede the State to any European Power.”

The Richmond Dispatch, in March, 1864, in an editorial on President Lincoln's amnesty proclamation, said:

“No one, however, knows better than Abraham Lincoln, that any terms he might offer the Southern people which contemplate their restoration to his bloody and brutal Government, would be rejected with scorn and execration. If instead of devoting to death our President and military and civil officers, he had proposed to make Jeff. Davis his successor, Lee, Commander-in-chief of the Yankee armies, and our domestic institutions not only recognized at home, but re-adopted in the free States, provided the South would once more enter the Yankee Union, there is not a man, woman, or child in the Confederacy, who would not spit upon the proposition. We desire no companionship upon any terms with a nation of robbers and murderers.”

A volume might be easily filled with sentiments similar to those quoted, showing that the people of the South were determined to accept no terms whatever, that ignored the recognition of the Southern Confederacy.

Yet, with a full knowledge of this determination on the part of the South, and the impossibility of restoring the Union, except by the defeat of the Confederate armies, the Democratic party tried to divide Northern sentiment and cripple the administration, by proclaiming that the Southern States were anxious to return to the Union, and that the Republican party would not allow them.

Impartial history will record these facts:

1. The Southern States gave up the Confederacy when they could no longer sustain it.

2. They came back to the Union when they had no power to keep themselves out.

3. The people are indebted for the preservation of the Union, not to the Southern States, for accepting what they had no power to reject, nor to the Democratic party for its peace propositions, but to the Republican party for organizing the means necessary for the prosecution of the war, and to the loyal millions who supported it with their votes, and under its inspiration fought for the salvation of the Union.

Can the nation forget these facts in ten short years? Can it blindly turn aside from Republicanism to the embrace of Democracy? Can it safely transfer the control of its Government from hands known to be loyal to those still red with the blood of its defenders? These are questions for the American people to answer, and on their solution depends the weal or woe of the Republic.

CONFEDERATE HOPES OF A DEMOCRATIC TRIUMPH.

It has been shown that, despite the assertions of the Northern Democracy, the Southern States were at no time, from the inception of the rebellion to its final crushing defeat, willing to make peace on any other terms than the recognition of the Southern Confederacy. To assume that Democratic leaders were ignorant of this, is to assume that those who were in correspondence with leading rebels knew less of their intentions than those who were not.

The Presidential election of 1864 was the turning-point in the rebellion. The Chicago Democratic Convention had declared the war a failure, and favored a cessation of hostilities. McClellan was the Presidential candidate on this platform. Although he professed a desire to restore the Union, it was plainly evident that his election would secure its permanent disruption. Rebel sympathizers in the North believed this, and the rebel authorities in the South so regarded it. The Southern Confederacy strained every nerve to hold out until the people of the North decided for the Union or against it. The re-election of Abraham Lincoln was the death blow of the slave confederacy. Its shell was broken, and its formidable resistance at end. The defeat of the Democratic party was the extinction of its hopes and pretensions.

In an interview with Governor Randall, in 1864, President Lincoln said :

"I do not think it is personal vanity or ambition, though I am not free from these infirmities, but I cannot but feel that the weal or woe of this great nation will be decided in November. There is no programme offered by any wing of the Democratic party but that must result in the permanent destruction of the Union.

"But, Mr. President, ventured Governor Randall, "General McClellan is in favor of crushing out this Rebellion by force. He will be the Chicago candidate."

"Sir," replied Mr. Lincoln, the slightest knowledge of arithmetic will prove to any man that the rebel armies cannot be destroyed by Democratic strategy. It would sacrifice all the white men of the North to do it. There are now in the service of the United States nearly 200,000 able bodied colored men most of them under arms, defending and acquiring Union territory. The Democratic strategy demands that these forces be disbanded, and that the masters be conciliated by restoring them to slavery. The black men who now assist Union men to escape, are to be converted into our enemies, in the vain hope of gaining the good will of their masters. We shall have to fight two nations instead of one.

"You cannot conciliate the South if you guarantee to them ultimate success; and the experience of the present war proves their success is inevitable if you fling the compulsory labor of millions of black men into their side of the scale. Will you give our enemies such military advantage as to insure success, and then depend on coaxing, flattery, and concession to get them back into the Union? Abandon all the posts now garrisoned by black men, take 200,000 men from our side and put them in the battle-field or corn-field against us, and we would be compelled to abandon the war in three weeks.

"We have to hold territory in inclement and sickly places; where are the Democrats to do this? It was a free fight, and the field was open to the war Democrats to put down this rebellion by fighting against both master and slave, long before the present policy was inaugurated.

"There have been men base enough to propose to me to return to slavery the black warriors of Port Hudson and Olustee and thus win the respect of the masters they fought. Should I do so, I should deserve to be damned in time and eternity. Come what will, I will keep my faith with friend and foe. My enemies pretend I am now carrying on this war for the sole purpose of abolition. So long as I am President it shall be carried on for the sole purpose of restoring the Union. But no human power can subdue this rebellion without the use of the emancipation policy, and every other policy calculated to weaken the moral and physical forces of the rebellion."

These practical views of President Lincoln fully illustrate what was then thought of the conservative policy of the Democratic party throughout the war. It was a policy which insisted upon treating as friends, men who had repudiated friendship, and who proclaimed themselves uncompromising enemies.

In a letter to Hon. E. B. Washburne, dated August 16, 1864, General Grant thus refers to Confederate hopes of a Democratic triumph in the North :

"I have no doubt but that the enemy are exceedingly anxious to hold out until after the Presidential election. They have many hopes from its effects. They hope for a counter revolution; they hope for the election of a peace candidate; in fact, like Micawber, they hope for something to turn up. Our peace friends, if they expect peace from separation, are much mistaken. It would be but the beginning of war, with thousands of Northern men joining the South, because of our disgrace in allowing separation. To have 'peace on any terms,' the South would demand a restoration of their slaves already freed. They would demand indemnity for losses sustained, and they would demand a treaty that would make the North slave hunters for the South. They would demand pay or the restoration of every slave escaping to the North."

Similar views were expressed by General Thomas, and other leading Union generals, who recognized in a Democratic triumph the success of the Confederacy.

It can be readily shown that while the Democratic party was trying to deceive the Northern people into the belief that the election of McClellan in 1864 would bring about a restoration of the Union, Southern leaders were regarding his election as the certain step toward Confederate recognition.

Sep. 22, 1864. Alexander H. Stephens, wrote to some of the leading members of the Georgia Legislature and thus expressed himself in regard to the Democratic party:

"The action of the Chicago convention, so far as its platform of principles goes, presents, as I have said on another occasion, a ray of light, which under Providence, may prove the dawn of day to this long and cheerless night, the first ray of light I have seen from the North since the War began. This cheers the heart and towards it I could almost exclaim: 'Hail! holy light, offspring of Heaven, first born of the eternal, o-eternal beam. May I express thee unblamed, since God is light.' Indeed I could have quite so exclaimed, but for the sad reflection that whether it shall bring healing in its beams or be lost in a dark and ominous eclipse ere its good work be done, depends so much upon the actions of others who may not regard it and view it as I do. So at best it is but a ray, a small and tremulous ray, enough only to gladden the heart and quicken the hope."

William W. Boyce, in a letter to Jefferson Davis, dated Sept. 29, 1864, thus refers to the efforts of Northern Democracy.

"But fortunately Mr. Lincoln and those he represents are not all of the North. There is a powerful party which condemns his policy. That party is rational on the subject of slavery. It represents whatever of amity or conservatism is left at the North. This party proposes that the war shall cease, at least temporarily, and that all the States should meet in amicable council, to make peace if possible. This is the most imposing demonstration in favor of peace made at the North since the war broke out. I think our only hope of a satisfactory peace, one consistent with the preservation of free institutions, is the supremacy of this party at some time or other. Our policy, therefore, is to give this party all the capital we can. It may be objected that to meet the Northern States in convention, is to abandon our present form of Government. But this no more follows than that their meeting us implies an abandonment of their form of Government. A Congress of the States in their sovereign capacity is the highest acknowledgment of the principles of State rights."

Herschel V. Johnson, in a letter dated September 25, 1864, in referring to the peace movements of Democracy said:

"I look with anxiety to the approaching Presidential election in the United States. For, although the Chicago platform falls below the great occasion, and the nominee still lower, yet the triumph of the Democratic party of the North will certainly secure a temporary suspension of hostilities and an effort to make peace by an appeal to reason. They confess that four years of bloody war, as a means of restoring the Union, has proven a failure. They declare that the true principles of American Government have been disregarded and trampled under foot by the present executive of the United States. Their success will bring a change of administration, and, with that, a change of policy.

* * * * *

"If the Government of the United States should pass into other hands, repudiate the policy of subjugation, and indicate a desire for negotiation, I would, if need be, have our Government propose it—certainly accept the offer of it, if tendered by the Federal authorities.

"We cannot have peace so long as the present rulers of the United States are in power."

In a letter to Thos. J. Semmes, under date of Nov. 5, 1864, Alexander H. Stephens, in speaking of the Chicago Convention, and its desire for a Convention of States, said:

"There is no prospect of such a proposition being tendered, unless McClellan should be elected. He cannot be elected without carrying a sufficient number of the States, which, if united with those of the Confederacy, would make a majority of the States. In such a convention then, so formed, have we not strong reasons to hope and expect that a resolution could be passed, denying the constitutional power of the Government, under the compact of 1787, to coerce a State? The Chicago platform virtually does this already. Are there not strong reasons, at least, to induce us to hope and believe that they might? If that could be done it would end the war. It would recognize as the fundamental principle of American institutions the ultimate, absolute sovereignty of the several States. This fully covers our independence—as fully as I wish ever to see it covered.

* * * * *

"You will also allow me to say, that I look upon the election of McClellan as a matter of vast importance to us in every view of the case, and hence I thought it judicious, patriotic, and wise, to do every thing that could be properly done to aid in his election. Whatever may be his individual opinion, he is the candidate of the State Rights party of the North, in opposition to the centralists and consolidationists, whose hobby now is abolitionism. I have thought, from the beginning, that our true policy was to build up and strengthen such a party at the North by all means in our power. Not only upon the wise maxim of Philip of Macedon, to divide the enemy as a question of policy merely, but from a higher and much nobler motive.

Not only an early peace, but our future safety, security, and happiness required it.

"The old Union and the old Constitution are both dead, dead forever, except in so far as the Constitution has been preserved by us. There is for the Union as it was, no resurrection by any power short of that which brought Lazarus from the tomb. There may be, and doubtless are, many at the North, and some at the South, who look forward to a restoration of the Union and the Constitution as it was; but such ideas are vain and illusory, as the dreamy imaginings of the Indian warrior, who, in death, clings to his weapons in fond expectation that he will have use for them beyond the grave, in other lands and new hunting grounds.

"These fears of voluntary reconstruction are but chimeras of the brain. No one need entertain any such from McClellan's election. But, on the contrary, I think that peace upon the basis of a separation of the States and our independence, would be the almost certain ultimate result if our authorities should act wisely, in the event of his election. * * * *

"At least two-thirds of McClellan's own party manfully hold and proclaim the doctrine that there is no power in the central Government to coerce a State. This element would oppose a further prosecution of the war. Meanwhile financial embarrassments would be doing their work. The war would inevitably fail in consequence (in the event of McClellan's attempting to carry it on). When all efforts to persuade our people to go back into the Union voluntarily, failed, as they would, if our authorities shall so act as to secure the hearts and affections of the people as they ought, then McClellan would ultimately be compelled to give up the restoration of the Union as a forlorn hope. Peace would come slowly but surely upon our own terms, and without any more fighting.

"Other causes would operate to the same results, which, of themselves, even without considering those above stated, would effect the same thing. The moment McClellan should renew the war with the avowed object of restoring the Union with the old Constitution and all its guarantees, that moment, or as soon as possible, our recognition abroad would come. * * * *

"Lincoln had either to witness our recognition abroad, the moral power of which alone, he saw, would break down the war, or to make it an emancipation war. He chose the latter alternative, and the more readily because it chimed in so accordantly with the feelings and views of his own party. This, in my opinion, is the plain English of the whole matter; and just as soon as McClellan should renew the war with a view to restore the Union, the old Constitution, with slavery, etc., would England, France, and other European Powers, throw all the moral power and influence of their recognition on our side.

"So in any and every view I can take of the subject, I regard the election of McClellan, and the success of the State Rights party of the North, whose nominee he is, of the utmost importance to us. With these views, you readily perceive how I regarded the action of the Chicago convention as a ray of light, the first ray of real light I had seen from the North since this war began."

The views presented, coming as they do from those who were considered conservative leaders in the South, prove conclusively, that the Democratic policy, throughout the war, tended to prolong the rebellion by exciting well-grounded hopes of the ultimate recognition of the Southern confederacy. They further prove that the old Democratic cry of the "Constitution as it is, and the Union as it was," was as utterly repudiated by the rebels themselves as was the Federal authority against which they fought. Therefore, it may be fairly concluded, that the triumph of the Democratic party in 1864 would have resulted in the permanent dissolution of the American Union.

DEMOCRACY AND RECONSTRUCTION.

Has Democracy changed in its principles since the close of the war? If it has, there is no record of the change. Throughout the period of reconstruction, when the Government sought to throw proper safeguards around the Republic, and to provide a Republican form of Government in those States lately in rebellion, the Democratic party was even more unanimous in its opposition to Governmental measures than it was during the war, and this opposition it has continued down to the present time.

The 14th and 15th amendments to the Constitution, absolutely necessary for the protection of the nation in the future, were opposed unanimously by the Democrats, not only in Congress, but throughout the States passing upon their ratification. The joint resolution proposing the 14th amendment, passed the House, June 8, 1866, by a vote of 138 yeas to 36 nays, not a Democrat voting in its favor. The joint resolution proposing the 15th amendment, passed the House January 30, 1869, by a vote of 150 yeas to 42 nays, not a Democrat voting in its favor.

Thus two of the most important amendments to the Constitution, on which vast interests of property and life depend for safety and security, are in force to-day, without the endorsement of a single Democratic vote. Is it probable, in view of this significant fact, that a Democratic administration would faithfully carry out their righteous provisions?

A review of the Congressional record shows a marked unanimity on the part of the Democrats against all measures of reconstruction. During the war, they based their opposition on the ground that the Union could be preserved without fighting, although the mighty armies of the Confederacy proved this to be impossible. At the close of the war, they opposed all reconstruction measures on the ground that the States could be restored without them, although disorder, and anarchy, and smothered hate in the rebellious States proved this to be impossible.

The Government exerted itself to restore all the Southern States to their proper relations in the Union, and to lift as quickly as possible the hardships of war from the shoulders of the Southern people. But at all times, in every effort, Democracy met it with opposition. It threw obstacles in the way; it encouraged the Southern people to believe, as it did in 1860, that their rights were being invaded; it aroused a feeling of bitterness and defiance, against which the Government was forced to contend; it created divisions among those who had honestly accepted the situation; it finally arrayed, through its influence, the whites against the blacks. In a word, it prolonged the period of reconstruction, as it had the period of war, by clamoring for certain conditions which it knew to be impossible, and by holding out hopes to the Southern States which it knew could never be realized.

The Ku-Klux organizations; the white masses of helpless men who have called for no trace as directly the encouragement as and out, by the Democratic leaders. And prosperity have been States, and even at the close of the war, the firmness of the Government as it prosecuted the war of the Union, and right nor to the left, so it has gone on with its work of reconstruction. The Democratic opposition, it has resorted to the revolted material wealth of the Southern States times the entire believes that the South will be converted by the Government but to study the Southern States where it is the character of the suffrage and labor;

the reassertion of the old State Rights doctrine, which marked its rule in ante bellum times; the cunningly drawn amendments to State constitutions intended to again divide allegiance; the political character of the men who are to represent it in the coming Congress; the elevation through its votes and influence of those who were mainly responsible for the Southern rebellion, and who led its armies against the Government. All these things combined, point, as with the finger of prophecy, to the resurrection of the fatal doctrine of State Rights under Democratic domination, if again clothed with national power by the votes of the American people. Its votes, its speeches, its acts, prove the Democratic party the same enemy of good government that was dismissed from power in 1860. Shall it be restored? Can the nation trust in its hands its honor, its unity, and the solution of those great problems of humanity and civilization, which to-day demand the highest wisdom and the purest patriotism.

Why should it trust to-day what it dared not trust in 1860, 1864, 1868, 1872? The party has not changed. Its principles, its sympathy, its purposes are as clearly defined now as then. If the nation could not trust the men who voted and worked against the Union, how can it trust them, now that they are under the domination of those who fought against it? Let loyal men have faith in the party that has so nobly borne the burdens of the past, and so grandly brought the nation through its trials. Let them forget all local jealousies and minor issues until it is settled beyond dispute, that the men who saved the Republic shall continue to govern it. Let them hold out to all, whether friends or foes, that the only true basis for reconciliation and safety, is, devotion to the Union, and obedience to its laws and authority.

Under Republicanism a grand future awaits the Republic. If it continues true to the principles of freedom, justice and humanity, it will soon become the leader among the nations of the earth. Already its name is honored throughout the civilized world. Its mighty power, as shown in the crushing out of the greatest rebellion of modern times; its wonderful development since the close of the war; its admirable system of finance, which has made it possible for the Government to meet every obligation; its willingness and ability to protect its citizens at home and abroad; its generous treatment toward those who forfeited by treason all claims upon its generosity; its hearty sympathy for the oppressed of every clime, have won for it the respect and admiration of all nations that love freedom and justice. Devotion to Republicanism means fidelity to the nation.

TAKING A CENSUS—IN WHAT STATES—AN INDUSTRIAL CENSUS IN MASSACHUSETTS.

Nothing shows the peculiar nature of State-growth on this Continent more than the strange diversity of Constitutional provisions and laws relating to subjects on which most ordinary students of the science of Government would expect to find some uniformity, as they can see the great advantage to be achieved by such unity and general identity. Take the matter of school laws and requirements, for instance, and examine the tables, reports and other sources of information, which have, during the past five years, been gathered under the National Bureau of Education, in its annual reports. Complication seems to have been originally added, in order to produce diversity, so that the people of one State might dilate, with pride, on the differences between their institutions and those of some other State. Lawyers and students of political science are quick to perceive the diversities that exist in our local courts and their modes of procedure, descending even to the petty details of a "justice" bench. A comprehensive scheme of jurisprudence is regarded by scholars as notable evidence of national character. But out of our diversity, often unnecessary and harrassing to those who practice law or have to plead in courts, has grown a system of equity which has already lifted the decisions of our highest courts in the opinion of the civilized world, and must in the long-run, evolve principles of jurisprudence, as comprehensive as those which our policy as a nation has virtually incorporated into the international political and commercial codes, under which the intercourse of nations is mainly directed.

These differences are most strikingly exhibited in the older States. In the majority of the "Land States," as those Commonwealths are termed, which have been carved out of the Public domain, there is, in some matters, a greater degree of uniformity. This is due to causes common to all of them. The United States system of land survey and sub-division, is, in part, accountable for a general acceptance of the political as well as geographical township. Again, in many of the States the emigrants, who, in the main shaped their first Constitution, may have largely come from adjoining States. The Constitution of Ohio will be found to have been the basis of a majority of the central Western States. Michigan has moulded the Northwest, while the Southern States have taken on a more provincial hue, owing largely to the necessities superimposed by slavery and the Spanish and French law, custom and traditions, which have been incorporated into the life of such States as Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, part of Texas. "Parishes," "districts" and "magistrates' beats," as municipal sub-divisions, are heard of in the former slave States, while the land terms belong to other nationalities, making a "confusion of tongues" which strikes Northern or Western citizens, as so conflicting. Another illustration of the fact, that unity is not always found in diversity, as we are apt to boast in relation to American affairs in general, is that of weights and measures. There are wide differences in different sections, especially in dry measure, which cannot but injuriously effect the consumer's interests.

Perhaps the useless diversity under consideration, can find no better illustration than in the provisions found in State Constitutions or laws, relative to the enumeration of inhabitants or census-taking, within the borders of the several States. Under the Federal Constitution, a general census is taken at the end of each decade. In addition to this, a majority of the States provide for some sort of intermediate enumeration of their inhabitants. The logical and common sense view of such provisions and what is to be accomplished thereby, would be to make them decennial in character, so that they might afford an admirable means of comparison between those taken by the General Government. This uniformity has not been adopted, and it is difficult to imagine why, in most cases.

In Hough's "American Constitutions," vol. ii., page 607, will be found a table under the title of "Basis of Representation; census," which illustrates this diversity. The States in which a separate census is provided for are Alabama, Arkansas, California, Florida, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, New York, North Carolina, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Carolina and Wisconsin—in all seventeen.

The States in which no provision is made either by Constitutional requirement or legislative enactment, are the following: Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Illinois, Maine, New Jersey, Ohio, Texas, Vermont, Virginia and West Virginia—in all eleven.

In the States of Maryland and New Hampshire, the legislature can make provision for such occasional enumeration as they may deem proper.

In six of the remaining States, provision is made for the taking of a census regularly, at the following periods and dates:

Indiana every six years; the last being had in 1871.

Kentucky every eight years; the last in 1873.

Missouri every ten years; the last in 1866.

Pennsylvania every seven years; the last in 1871.

Tennessee every ten years; the last in 1871.

Michigan every ten years; the last being in 1874.

In the State of Mississippi the new constitution required that the legislature should provide for the taking of the census as a basis of apportionment at its first session, and every ten years thereafter. If such action has ever been had, it is not known at this writing.

There seems to have been some concerted action in the Southern States now under Democratic rule with regard to the present census. But whether there was or not, the result is the same, and that is a failure to provide therefor. Florida, Alabama, Arkansas and North Carolina, are under the control of the party of reaction. Just as its disposition is manifested by cutting down the school funds, it is also exhibited in refusing appropriations for the purpose now under consideration. In Alabama and North Carolina it was openly avowed that the money required for the census should be diverted to defraying the expenses of constitutional conventions, illegally called, and intended to obliterate the landmarks, so far as courage and opportunity allows, gained under Republican reconstruction. In Florida, as far as is known, no action has been taken, while in Louisiana and South Carolina of the Southern States alone will there be an enumeration. Both States are Republican in politics.

Elsewhere the census-takers are busily engaged in the States of California, Iowa, Kansas, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, New York, Oregon, Rhode Island and Wisconsin. These thirteen States in which enumeration is to be had, will enable the statisticians to make a fair exhibit for the centennial year, of the then actual condition of the Union. It is greatly to be regretted that action was not taken in all the States, so that we might have known in positive form the huge strides taken in every direction by the Republic, whose birth was recognized one hundred years ago by thirteen feeble colonies and their three million of inhabitants.

In all the States but Massachusetts, the plan adopted, is that of enumeration by means of officers appointed for the purpose, in the same way that the United States census is taken. This is regarded as the best one, where the population is scattered over large areas, or special circumstances lead to the belief, as in the case of a large body of foreign-born residents, that individual citizens would not be likely to fill up the blanks in proper form.

The two more important States retaining this form of census-taking are New York and Rhode Island.

The latter State is the first to complete the digest and publish the returns. The enumeration was made with very great care, and every attention was given from the start to the minutest details necessary for its correct and complete taking. A close scrutiny was instituted with respect to the qualifications of the enumerators, and the result as regards completeness and prompt presentation of the digested result is, as was reasonable to anticipate, in a very high degree satisfactory.

The population of the entire State, according to the census of 1875, is 258,132; according to the National census of 1870, it was 217,353, showing a gain in five years of 40,779—18½ per cent. for the five years, or 3½ per cent. per annum.

The population of the State, according to the State census of 1865, was 184,965. Comparing this with the numbers just ascertained, it appears that the gain in ten years is 73,167, a gain of 39½ per cent. for the decade, or 3¾ per cent. per annum. During the first five years of the decade, the increase was at the rate of 3¼ per cent. per annum.

It will be seen that the increase during the second half of the decade is greater than during the first; the increase during the first having been 32,388, and during the second half 40,779, making together an entire increase of 73,167.

The schedules adopted by New York, are quite as full as the system allows, and the work is well advanced to completion.

Schedule No. I relates to population, and embraces the following questions:

1. What is the number of this house and the name of the street in which it is situated?

2. Of what material is it built? Of wood, stone, marble or brick?

3. What is its present valuation as it stands—not as regards its assessed value or original cost?

4. How many families reside in this house? Are there any families residing in the cellar or basement, if the house has a cellar or basement?

5. What are the names of the persons residing in this house?

6. What is the age and what the sex of every person residing in this house?

7. Who of them are white, who black, who mulatto, who Indian, who Chinese, who Japanese?

8. How does such persons stand in relation to the head or heads of the family or families in this house? That is to say, who are wives, sons, daughters, or relatives, to the head or heads of the family or families? Who servants, and of what grade?

9. What is the birthplace of each person?

10. Who of them are married who widowed, who single?

11. What is the profession, trade, or occupation of each one?

12. What is the usual place of employment of each one? Are any members of the family absent in the service of the United States, and, if so, in what service?

13. Who of the residents in this house are voters? Who are the voters of native birth, who are voters by naturalization? Who of the residents are aliens?

14. Who of the residents are owners of land?

15. How many residents are there over 21 years of age who can neither read nor write?

16. Who and how many of the residents are deaf and dumb, blind, insane, or idiotic?

It will be noticed that the foregoing looks to the bringing out of facts not heretofore embraced in a census, such as the material, valuation, etc., of the inhabited buildings, number of city land owners, mulattoes, Japanese, voters, &c. The New York census is the first in which the Japanese residents are to be enumerated separately. The Federal census of 1860, was the first at which an enumeration of Chinese residents was made.

Schedule No. II relates to marriages and contains the following questions:

1. Of the husband: What is your full name? What is your age? What was your civil condition before the present marriage; were you single, a widower or divorced?

2. Of the wife: What is your full name? What is your exact age? What was your civil condition previous to the present marriage; were you single, a widow or divorced?

3. What is the exact date of your marriage?

4. What is the name of the city or town in which the marriage took place?

5. By whom was it solemnized? By a clergyman, a civil magistrate, or by a declaration before witnesses? Give me the name or names of the clergyman, magistrate, or witnesses by or before whom the marriage was contracted.

This is a new form and will elicit a great deal of valuable data, as will also Table No. III, concerning deaths, in which these questions are asked:

1. What is the name of the person deceased? The age, sex, color, and civil condition.

2. What was the exact date of death?

3. What the native country of deceased?

4. What the trade or occupation of deceased?

5. What the disease or cause of death?

Schedules IV and V relate to agriculture and other industries, and are in the main, modeled after those of the United States census for similar purpose. A miscellaneous schedule is added, covering places of public worship, public libraries, literary institutions, newspapers, etc., number of hotels, stores, &c., in each district, domestic animals in cities and villages, remarks on the harvest, mortality, etc., and a table of wages, exclusive of board. A special blank is provided for deaf, dumb, blind and idiotic, which is to be filled by medical men and the officers of institutions devoted to their care.

Complaints are quite frequent in the New York press, urban and rural, of the careless and indifferent manner in which the enumerators perform their duties. This is especially charged against those of New York City. It is asserted that whole blocks and rows have been omitted; that flagrant delays have occurred, while it is certain that the officers themselves have been greatly impeded by inhabitants refusing information. Nor are these latter complaints made of the poorer classes alone; but largely of persons residing in the more fashionable portions. It is even asserted that so far as the city is concerned, the work is unreliable and proposals are being discussed to induce the Legislature to have the work done over again. It is understood this is, in part, due to the regulations of the Bureau in charge, requiring too much at the hands of one enumerator, but more to the fact that the work has been used to reward political strikers of the Democratic persuasion. It is worth noting, at this point, that the compilers believe the returns will show a population of more than 1,200,000 in the city of New York. As the census is to be made the basis of apportionment for Legislative representation, it will be seen that important interests are watching its results with anxiety. So far as they are known, it appears that a large increase is exhibited in the interior cities and towns.

Massachusetts is the first State to formally recognize the position of Labor, and its right to recognition at the hands of government, in so far as to systematically make inquiries and report on the conditions and relations existing between employer and employed, capital and labor, production and speculation. The Bureau of Labor Statistics in that State, established under a Republican State administration and legislation, is the first evidence given that the standpoint of the men who toil for wages is to be considered, co-equally at least with that of the men who work for profit. The four valuable reports of this Bureau have not been given to the public without arousing severe animadversions from antagonizing interests. While the Bureau was open during the first years to the criticism that it was used too exclusively as a means of agitation, and not enough as a clear and impartial channel of examination, it has, nevertheless, steadily increased its hold on public attention, alike in the State of whose administrative machinery it forms a part, and in the larger body outside, interested in the subjects committed to its charge.

The taking of the industrial and decennial census, now in progress, has been committed to the charge of this Bureau. The present chief, Col. Carroll D. Wright, and his able deputy, Major Long, are fine types of the clear-headed young men who have been practically disciplined by service as citizen-soldiers, while trained in their public and political relations in the school of loyalty to freedom, equity and national integrity, honored under the name of the Republican party. Understanding, then, that the people, in their organized capacity, have a right to a knowledge of the facts which affect and control their action as individuals, whenever said facts relate themselves to the community as well, they have endeavored to shape their inquiries in such a way as will bring out the largest amount of information, giving a thoroughly practical and comprehensive character to the schedule. They recommended, and the Legislature adopted, a form of schedules, which requires the persons to be enumerated themselves to fill up the blanks. The forms adopted in the national census legislation, and followed generally by the States, in taking their census, requires the enumerator or marshal to fill the blanks himself. The plan adopted by Massachusetts is, however, the first attempt but one* of the kind, made in this country. It is based on what is termed a simultaneous enumeration; i. e., a statement of the entire number of inhabitants in the State, on a certain day, made by each householder or head of a family. Dr. Barnard, formerly National Commissioner of Education, says, in relation to the one taken in the District of Columbia, that "Three methods of enumeration have hitherto been employed in taking a census: By the first, formerly used in the national census and still practiced in several of the Western States, the returns are made by families upon blanks ruled into as many columns as the census makes inquiries, and each family using but one line of the blank; by the second method, used in the national census, at the last two enumerations, and in several of the Northern and Eastern States, the blank provides that each name shall occupy one line, and the page is ruled into as many columns as there are separate inquiries."

Both these methods require the intervention of an enumerator, who writes down on the spot the information given him. The third is that adopted by the Commissioner. In several European countries, notably Great Britain and Bavaria, the custom has long been to employ householders' schedules, to be left with every family for a few days before the day fixed for taking the census, with instructions requiring the head of each family to fill out the various answers. This is the one adopted by Massachusetts. How thoroughly the Bureau has shaped the needed inquiries may be seen from the following review of the blanks:

There are five schedules, the "Family," "Individual," "Manufactures," "Occupation," "Products and Property." Accompanying these are instructions as to the proper way of filling them; also very complete instructions to the enumerators. The first schedule is that for the "Family." It is ruled in blanks on both sides, and on the file front where folded, the officer has to insert "A" number of dwelling house; "B" family number; "C" number of families in each house, and "D" how many pay rent. Persons are informed that they are required by law to fill up the blanks and properly answer inquiries. Then follows a certificate of distribution and reception after being filled, which is signed by the official who does this work. The inquiries are then found on each side, designated as "A" and "B." The several blank columns are numbered from "one" to "twelve." The following schedule belongs to this:

* The exception noted above was that of the District of Columbia, where the Bureau of Education, under a resolution of Congress, adopted March 9, 1867, provided for a school census therein. The police were used to distribute the form, and an enumeration of all the inhabitants was had on the eleventh of November, following. The plan was successful, and the results satisfactory.

Christian name in full, and initial of middle name; surname; relation to head of family; sex and age; color and race.

Single, married, widowed or divorced; number of children borne by women; place of birth.

Profession, trade or occupation.

Children attending school three months during the year ending May 1, 1875; cannot read; cannot write.

Deaf, dumb, deaf and dumb, blind, insane, idiotic and degree of infirmity; how long afflicted; particular disease or accident causing the infirmity; if from birth, give blood relationship of those similarly afflicted.

If pauper, give cause of pauperism.

If convict, give nature of crime.

Ratable Polls; legal voters; naturalized voters.

This gives a very complete basis for the enumerated side of the census. This numbering of the inhabitants was formerly the only purpose of a census. The necessities of our complex life made other data essential. Under the foregoing schedule there will be obtained a very accurate enumeration of whole and comparative "illiteracy"—a distinction which is of value, but it has not heretofore been obtained. Under the national census, the distinction is not made, and so persons who can read, but not write, or vice versa, are not separated from those who can do both. The questions numbered from 11 to 14, have been adversely commented on, but the Bureau in reply has cleared up misapprehension. It is claimed that the comparatively small number of cases to which the questions apply, as the probable fact that the parties are under medical care, renders the facts require^d readily obtainable.

The "individual schedule" marks the distinct departure made in the Bay State from old systems. If this blank is generally and properly filled it will meet one of the most important wants of social and economic science, by presenting a very large amount of reliable data on the important points indicated. The Bureau believes that at least two-thirds of the one hundred thousand blanks it has distributed will be correctly filled. The questions contained in this schedule are:

What is the occupation upon which you chiefly depend for a livelihood; were you at work May 1, 1875; number depending upon you for support; number of hours per day employed in your occupation; number of days employed in it, during the year ending May 1, 1875.

Average daily wages, for working days, derived from it, during the year ending May 1, 1875; amount of wages derived from it, for the year ending May 1, 1875; amount of your other earnings for the year ending May 1, 1875; amount of wife's earnings for the year ending May 1, 1875; amount of minor children's earnings for the year ending May 1, 1875.

Number of persons in your family, over 18 years of age, prevented by continuous sickness or physical disability from attending to any occupation.

Do you own the house you live in; if you own it, what is the amount of mortgage on it; rates of interest paid on such mortgage; if you hire, what is the number of rooms; amount paid for a year's rent.

Value of garden crops raised by you, and used in your family, less all money expenditures on account of the same.

Cost of supporting your family [or yourself,] for the year ending May 1, 1875.

Amount deposited in savings banks by your family [or yourself].

Number of volumes in your private library if the number is 100 or over.

It must be borne in mind in reviewing these questions and those of the other schedules, that the law under which they were framed, expressly guarantees, that the returns are to be regarded as strictly confidential, that no names are to be used in connection with the facts stated, that these are not to be at any time made the basis of assessment or taxation, and penalties are provided for improper use, as well as for refusal to properly fill the various schedules provided.

The object of the census being to present the actual condition of Massachusetts, at the close of the first century of its active State life, there are in addition to the foregoing schedules, others which will, when filled, exhaustively present the material facts for such a review. The next blank is the "manufacturer's schedule," and the person filling it tells the value of his buildings and machinery, of foreign machinery bought in the last decade, and the description, quantity and value of stock used and goods manufactured during the last year; the number of persons employed, their working time and wages, motive power, size of establishment and fire-escapes. A separate item is made of the work furnished women at their homes, and relief funds and libraries are also mentioned. The other questions on this paper relate to gas companies, paper, grist flouring, and lumber mills, tanneries and cheese factories, machinery for cotton, woolen and worsted goods, ship-yards and publishing houses of all kinds. It also requires a classification of labor as to ages, sex, day and piece work, highest and lowest rate of wages at specified periods during the year ending May 1, 1875, ranged according to age and sex. This schedule properly filled, is one of the most valuable of the series, and properly helps to supplement that for the individual laborer, already given.

The next is the "occupation schedule," which is to be filled out by all other employers, and seeks information of the number of hands in each occupation, the value of their work and the capital invested, the number of each sex both under and over fifteen years of age, and the time each class is employed, as well as the highest, lowest and average wages. The motive power used is to be described minutely, and the number given of those killed or disabled by accident in each establishment during the past year; the dimensions of the building used are also asked for, with the persons employed on each floor and the means provided for escape in case of fire. The fishermen are required to give the same class of information concerning wages, profits and investments in cod, mackerel, shell-fish and whale-fishing. Coastwise and ocean commerce are also to be stated, the hands and capital employed, names of vessels, whether owned by citizens or foreigners, residents of the State or otherwise ; also the value and proportion of the shares owned by each class.

The remaining general schedule, for "products and property," is for those owning or hiring farms, market-gardens, mines, quarries, etc. The first provides for the returns of domestic manufactures, which include many things, from bark, blankets, boots and butter, to railroad sleepers, sorghum molasses, wines and yarn. The description, acreage, quantity mown and value of hay, form a separate division ; the acreage, quantity and value of over fifty kinds of vegetables and grain are asked about, with information concerning as many more miscellaneous farm products, including fruits, meats and dairy crops. The description and value of farm lands and buildings are taken in detail, and also the other productive property, including trees and vines, mines, quarries, pits, and domestic animals, while there are also questions concerning the number of persons employed and wages paid. There are some special schedules intended for the officers of public and private institutions, such as prisons, poor-houses, reform schools, houses of correction, asylums for the insane, blind, deaf mutes, libraries and schools (public and private), and reservoirs. The information under the last head will be scanned with some interest, after the disasters which have occurred from the destruction of some of them within a year or two.

The work is progressing with rapidity and a completeness that fully equals expectation. and all the returns are already in the hands of the compilers. Colonel Wright fully expects to present the report at the meeting of the Legislature, and its publication will be pressed with the utmost speed. This census is the crowning effort of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, as such, to fitly bear its share in the coming centennial representation. It will be, without doubt, worthy of her great place and character.

ITS MISSION NOT ENDED. — For fourteen years the Republican party has governed the nation. Its record has become the most brilliant chapter in American history. No citizen need blush over a single line. Posterity will dwell with admiration over the grand work recorded in so brief a space of time.

It has delivered the nation from the hands of its enemies ; its future mission will be to conduct it to the highest possible plane of nationality. It has a public debt to pay, the pledged faith of the country to maintain, a currency to redeem in coin, an emancipated race to protect, before it can retire from a work to which it was called by the voice of the people.

It is not idle boasting, but a recognized truth, when we say that the Republican party represents the intelligence, the wisdom, the patriotism, the honor of the nation, as found among all classes, among men of culture, wealth, industry, the true governing elements of nations.

Democracy has some good men in its ranks, men who desire to do right, and who earnestly seek through their votes and influence to advance the interests of their country. But they are in a hopeless minority, powerless to control the bad elements which exert a controlling influence in the Democratic party.

Rascals will creep into the best organized society. They will get into the church, the best protected orders, the family circle. They are not invited, but they come under the guise of honor, and are known only when their acts betray them. Such men are discovered from time to time in the Republican party, but as soon as known they receive the lash of indignation, or if criminally guilty, the penalties laid down in the law.

To search out and punish the delinquent, to ignore the unworthy, to turn a cold shoulder to those who would use the party to promote their own selfish purposes, should be the object and aim of true Republicans. Our ranks are filled with noble characters, men of public and private virtue, whose names have become household words in the localities where they reside. To bring them to the front, to nominate them for office, to select them as leaders, is to write victory on our party banners. Let this important duty be performed.

EDUCATION IN ALABAMA.

The progress of Democratic reconstruction will bear continued watching, especially in the direction of public education. There is a good deal of discussion going on in the Southern States, both in the press and the forum. A few notes by the way will not be misplaced.

In the partial reaction of 1874, Alabama was carried by the Democrats. As elsewhere, victory there is followed by blows at the public school system, as established under the Republican constitution of 1868. The character of those blows illustrate their policy of action and shows the value of the talk now so abundant.

The Mobile Register of the 1st inst., contains an able address made by ex-State Superintendent of Public Instruction, Joseph Hodgson, before the schools of Mobile and an audience of the friends thereof. That Mr. Hodgson is not in marked opposition to the party in power there, is evident by his words, and so in using them, the accusation of unfairness cannot be made.

Preparatory to a statement of the present policy, comes an account of the ante-bellum schools, funds and legislation, which shows with great clearness the manner in which the slaveocracy of the South dealt with this subject.

Alabama was admitted to the Union in 1862, and set aside the sixteenth section of the Constitution which township for education was used under the grant, and the township wherein it was no such section before the Federal Government, other towns were to be selected elsewhere. The area was about one and one-half million acres.

A considerable proportion of the more valuable cotton lands.

Some portion of it is still unsold at the present time. It has been shamefully mismanaged. In 1856, no public schools were established, and the funds derived from the sixteenth section, were used for private schools. Up to 1868, a Constitutional system in 1868, there were no free schools in Alabama. Mobile possessed, till the war broke out, the nearest approach thereto. Col. Hodgson tells of a township owned by a few planters, who had themselves made School Commissioners, and then appropriated the school land to defray the education of their own children in Europe. The breaking out of the civil war in 1861, stopped even the feeble efforts, theretofore making, to maintain public schools at different points. When the war closed, the Democratic Legislature organized under the call of Andrew Johnson, appropriated the State school fund, small as it was, to pay the interest on the bonded debt and to meet other expenses of the State.

This school fund is derived from the proceeds of the school lands. That trust was badly managed. Instead of several millions, the total proceeds thereof amounted to but $1,837,000. As a fund its existence is only nominal.

Col. Hodgson says:

"It was lost through the ruin of the State banks, and exists to-day only as an interest-bearing debt recognized by the State. Within the past few years the State has allowed an annual interest of eight per cent. upon this trust debt; amounting for the year 1875 to $146,983.00."

The present Legislature reduced the interest to four per cent. In 1852 the interest allowed was six per cent. The Republican Legislature, from 1868 on, allowed eight per cent. The reduction of interest is now the only depletion this valuable fund has undergone.

The annual School fund in 1854 and '56, amounted to $270,000. In 1860, it was reported at $276,024—the interest on the land fund being $97,727. The balance was made up from interest on certain surplus revenues of the United States given to the States under the act of June 23, 1836, $53,526; an annual legislative appropriation of $100,000, and the retail license fees, etc., $24,770.

The Constitution of 1868, and the legislature framed under it by the Republican majority, increased the State school fund as follows :

Interest of 10th section fund.....	$147,983.32
Interest of surplus revenue fund..	53,526.94
One-fifth of the annual revenue..	250,000.00
Poll-tax collected.	80,000.00
Legislative appropriation.....	100,000.00
Total.....	$630,510.26

Among the first acts of the Democracy, when they once more obtained control of the Legislature was, the cutting away of several of these items. The reductions were :

Interest on the surplus revenue fund.	$53,526
Annual appropriation	100,000
Reduction of interest on school land fund, to four per cent.....	73,491
Total reduction.....	$227,017

It is proposed to make up this reduction by a more faithful collection of the poll tax. This impost, as laid and controlled in the South, is made to bear hardest on the colored citizen, from whom, in fact, it is mainly collected. Its payment is a condition precedent to voting.

It is not proposed to deny that there is a larger and more creditable degree of interest on the subject of public education, throughout the South, in Alabama as well as elsewhere. To so deny, would be to confess that Republican principles and administration, had been barren of results in one of the most important of the aims they have sought. But on the other hand the old school of Democratic politicians are gaining renewed control. They have always been hostile to free schools, except when conducted as was formerly the case in Mississippi, as "poor" or pauper schools. Under their control, the general endowments for educational purposes, made by Congress from the earliest legislation on the territories down to the present time, have, so far as the South is concerned, been wantonly squandered ; used in the main for the corrupt advancement or enrichment of the privileged few. The same spirit is still at work.

An illustration of this has been given in the foregoing. The Alabama Legislature, (Democratic), have called a constitutional convention, for the avowed purpose of modifying and changing the one framed in 1868, in important particulars. The Democratic candidates for delegates from Mobile, were required to endorse the following, submitted by "Admiral" Semmes :

1. To vote for no delegate to the State convention who does not announce himself in advance as being uncompromisingly in favor of retaining in full the present constitutional exemptions.

2. Who is not in favor of restricting future legislatures from contracting debts in the name of, or pledging the faith of the State to any person or corporation.

3. Who is not in favor of expunging from the constitution any reference whatever to the late war, and the qualifications of voters as affected thereby.

4. Who is not in favor of abolishing the special school legislation.

This latter is probably a mere euphony for "equal and free schools." In connection with this matter of curtailing the usefulness of the common schools, it may be worth while to see what is the need thereof in Alabama.

According to the census of 1870 the school population, between the age of five and seventeen inclusive, in Alabama, was as follows :

Males	173,273
Females	169,703
Total	342,976
Native —Male.....	173,100
Female.....	169,548
Total foreign born.....	328
Whites —Male.....	91,989
Female.....	89,798
Total white.....	181,787
Colored —Male.....	81,274
Female.....	79,882
Total colored.....	161,156
Excess of white children over col...	20,631
Besides the above there are twenty-three Indian children in the State.

Of the foregoing school population the attendance in 1870 was as follows :

Male	31,098
Female	30,226
Total.....	61,324

The whole number of children of the school age being 342,976, the census leaves unaccounted for and not attending school not less than 265,837. According to colors the divisions were as follows :

Attending schools, White.....	61,324
“ “ Colored.....	15,815
	77,139

Dividing still further, and it will be seen that there were in 1870 not less than 120,463 white children not attending school, and presumably growing up in ignorance. Of the colored children, the result is as startling, though far more excusable, considering their but recent condition of slavery. The total not in attendance on school was 145,341.

Five years have passed since then, and if we estimate that the children attending school have increased by one-half, which is probably within the mark, we shall have a total school attendance of about 112,000 out of a school population of about 370,000, thus leaving 258,000 receiving no education. Nor is this the worst or sum total of illiteracy in Alabama, present and prospective.

According to the census of 1870, the total number of persons of the age of ten years and upwards, who could not read, was 349,771; while there were 380,012 who could not write. The actual illiterates were little less than one in three, out of a population numbering 996,992 persons. Of this class, 72,259 were white, and 280,898 colored. In the first class 48,430 were 21 and over; 19,599 from 15 to 21—making of those who had practically passed beyond school influences, a total of 68,029. The colored stood as follows: 15 to 21, 54,531; 21 years and over, 179,361, a total of 233,892. To these 38 Indians are to be added, making in 1870, a total of 251,658 persons over the age of 15 years, who were wholly illiterate, or not quite one in four of the whole population.

It is difficult to perceive why there should be any objection to the present Constitution, on the score of its article on education. It organizes a Board of Education, consisting of the governor, ex-officio, and without a vote, as he has to approve or otherwise, of its acts; the superintendent of public instruction, and two members from each Congressional district, nine in all. This body has the management of the common schools, and acts as Regents to the State University.

Section six provides that it shall “be the duty of the board to establish, throughout the State, in each township or other school district, which it may have created, one or more schools, at which all the children of the State, between the ages of five and twenty-one years, may attend free of charge.” Under the same article it is declared, the proceeds of all lands granted for the purpose, all swamp lands, and all other lands given by the State, or by individuals, and unclaimed estates, with all money paid for military exemptions, and the rent of leased lands, shall be reserved as a school fund. One-fifth of the annual revenue collected by the State is also to be devoted to school purposes. It is this latter portion which the Democratic legislature has refused to provide for, among the other reductions they have made.

These figures, compared with the Democratic reduction of the school fund, and Semmes' instructions relative to the school provisions of the Constitution, do not augur very well for Democratic interest, so far as Alabama is concerned, in the cause of public education.

If the Southern States have failed to become prosperous, the fault is not in the measures of reconstruction, but in the people themselves. If Southern Democrats had worked one-half as earnestly to help reconstruction as they have to oppose it, peace, security, happiness, and prosperity, would be fully possessed by the South to-day. It is not too late to learn wisdom from the past. Let the intelligence and wealth of the Southern States unite in efforts to build up, instead of tearing down, and the Centennial year will see the South on the high road to wealth.

NEW STATE CONSTITUTIONS.

The growth of the United States has been more marked than that of any other country. The age thereof is but ninety-nine years, but in that period, despite the fact that we started out on our march, staggering under a heavy national debt, and have been confronted by three sanguinary struggles, each of which made heavy drafts upon our treasure and resources, we stand to-day more than the peer of any nation on earth. Ninety-nine years ago, we numbered but thirteen States, whereas now we number thirty-seven States and ten territories. Then our territory embraced but three millions of people, while now we number forty-two million. Ninety-nine years ago we had no railroads. Nor was it until 1827 that the first railroad tie was laid, and in that year we had but three miles. Now we have over seventy thousand miles of railroad. Then we had no telegraph wires, neither had we half a century ago, but now we have one hundred and fifty thousand miles of electric telegraph, not counting some thirty-five thousand miles of submarine telegraph. The Fathers of the Republic never rode on a railroad car, sent a message by telegraph, used a postage stamp, or saw a self-sealing envelope. Steam, as a motive power, was undeveloped. Daguerre had not discovered the fact that the sun could be utilized as a portrait taker, and nearly all of the labor-saving machines of this age are creatures of the inventive genius of the present generation.

Great as has been our growth, it may be said that we are but beginning to grow. The billows of the Atlantic are made white with the steam and sails of vessels coming hither, bearing people from every nation, speaking every tongue and representing every class and condition of society, with strong hands and buoyant hearts, ready, willing and anxious to cultivate our soil, delve in our mines, work at our forges and add to our store of literature and general information. From the crowded streets of London, the pine-clad hills of Norway, the vineyards of Germany and France, tax and tithe-ridden Ireland, from every portion of the world come old men and women, young men and maid-ens, and women bearing in their arms their tender offspring, who have bidden farewell to the home of their birth and youth, and graves of their sires. The intelligence that a land of freedom, where despotism never reigned, where labor is respectable and laborers respected, and where industry is properly rewarded, had been wafted across the deep to them, and they resolved on casting their lot with us and becoming part of us.

One of the most prominent evidences of the growth of our country, is manifested in the fact that the States are outgrowing their Constitutions. Even those which have been working under Constitutions formed since the close of the late war, find themselves hampered thereby, and are forming new ones better adapted to the times and exigencies. True, some of the ante-bellum slave States, give evidence of being seized with apprehension, lest they have advanced too far, and favor retrogression, but the train of thought and progress is rushing along our every highway, and they who do not heed it will be crushed by its wheels. Especially do the fossils air their Bourbonism by opposing progressive school systems and measures, but the masses realize that education is the key to knowledge, and that knowledge is the basis of our system of government, the bulwark of our security as a nation and a people. The better informed the elector is, the more dependence he places upon his own power of discrimination, and the less is he controlled by those who have no responsibility for his action. The enfranchisement of the blacks and the securing of their civil rights, are measures which have shocked the reminiscences of ancient chivalry, and they would fain retard or impede the progress of those who accept the situation and hail its incident blessings.

Before us lies the Constitution lately framed by the Constitutional Convention of the "Junior State," Nebraska, an epitome of which cannot fail to interest the general reader :

It prohibits special legislation ; abolishes all fee compensation for State officers ; it confers the right of suffrage upon all male citizens of the United States, and all foreign-born citizens who have taken out naturalization papers; prohibits sectarian instruction in schools supported in whole or part by the State, and prohibits the acceptance by the State of any grant, conveyance or bequest of money or property to be used for sectarian purposes; prohibits the diversion of State revenue for any local purpose; limits its county taxes to $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; prohibits subscriptions by municipalities to railroads, but allows donations of money when sanctioned by a majority vote; confers on the legislature large powers over railroad management; declares railroads to be public highways and authorizes the Legislature to establish maximum rates of freight and transportation;

prohibits municipalities from incurring indebtedness for ordinary purposes exceeding five per cent. of the assessed value of property; provides that each Legislator and State officer shall subscribe to an oath not to take or accept a bribe, under penalty; drunkenness is made a cause for impeachment and removal from office.

There are two coupon or separate clauses—one prohibiting the removal of the State Capital, except by a majority vote of the people, the other providing for an expression of the people as to their preference for U. S. Senator, prior to the meeting of the Legislature, which shall elect such official, a new and novel feature, the teachings of which will be solicitously watched.

REPUBLICAN PROSPECTS.

We believe that the result of the State elections this fall will disclose a compact, vigorous and successful Republican party. From every quarter there comes the most cheering intelligence. Out of the shadow that came over us in the general elections of last year, we see unmistakable evidence of returning light and of noon-day effulgence. The dark cloud of political insanity, which since then has seemed to hang ominously over the nation, is surely breaking away, and the clear light of political reason is hastening its homeward flight. Not only those who have all along been Republicans, but truthful and honest men everywhere, have become conscious of the approach of danger, and that it must be averted. They are fully alive to the tremendous importance of the present campaign in the pivotal States, and they have both the courage and the ability to command success. In Ohio and in Pennsylvania, in Ohio especially, where the fiercest battle must be fought, our friends are marshaling in solid phalanx, with an earnestness and enthusiasm, that are auguries of victory in every good cause. The people, who, for various reasons, were sluggish and fretful a year ago, are now awake to the fact that they have some things yet which they hold dear, and which they are unwilling to surrender.

They well know that the time has come when they must renew in earnest the struggle with their desperate and unscrupulous foe; that the elections in October and November next, are something more than ordinary skirmishes—that they are battles for position in the great conflict next year for the possession of the national Government; and they do not propose to permit the occasion to pass without administering to their enemy such a rebuke as their audacity and hypocrisy deserve. It has not yet become quite clear to their minds, that it will be safe to trust well-known and avowed enemies with all that is most sacred in life; to drive from the grand old ship the crew that have remained steadfast in the performance of their trust, through storms and perils, through sorest trials and fiercest assault, that pirates may plunder and destroy her. Those who in all seasons have stood firm as a rock amid the sea, must not be supplanted by those who trim to every passing breeze, steadfast in nothing, but an eager desire to seize the spoils.

That the present omens are auspicious, need not be surprising. Last year, for various reasons, which no man could foresee and no government prevent, the people were sullen and supine, and showed their discontent by ting down their friends and voting up their enemies, who have either betrayed them, or who will do so at the first opportunity. There is then no great national peril; but that little experiment has fully satisfied their prurient curiosity. The friends of good government, of the maxims and tenets of the republican party, are now, as they have been since 1860, in the majority; and it is absurd and illogical to suppose, that in a crisis they would surrender all the ground they have dearly, yet so dearly, won. Experimenting with and trusting the Democratic party as now led, and as it is now comporting itself everywhere, would be a folly of which we trust the nation will never be guilty. To believe that, in the light of experience, and under the sober teachings of history, this people could so far forget their duty to themselves and their country, as to deliberately reverse all their glorious history, and set the seal of idiocy upon all their grandest achievements, by ushering into power a combination of men whose inspiration and hope are in the degradation and betrayal of the nation, would be unworthy an American citizen, and too absurd to find a lodgment in any honest heart. It takes long years of tyranny and oppression to reduce a great people to a state of indifference, and to cause them to look without concern and without dismay upon their ignominy and their shame. It was only after long centuries of shameless lawlessness and tyranny, that the once great Roman empire could be sold at auction to the highest bidder; and the day is yet distant when this people will so forget their duty and their honor, as to set their seal of condemnation upon all their achievements.

This then is the time for all good citizens to stand shoulder to shoulder; and we believe that thousands who have not yet affiliated with the Republican party, and thousands more, who, in 1872, followed an old and trusted leader into a crooked path, whose termination could be nowhere else than in the present so-called Democratic party, will now be found in our ranks. And they are welcome! Their hearts are with us, and let them come. The party has yet a bright future before it, and it cannot afford to quarrel with its friends over the past. It has freely used the scalpel and the broad-axe in severing from itself the putrid excrescences and deformities which are incident to human government, and it is now ready and equipped for the campaign.

MR. AMASA WALKER has written a letter on the finances, in which he says the Americans use a dollar of less value than that of any other civilized nation of the globe, and he adds:

“This is one of the chief causes of the existing business depression, and we shall not recover from it fully until our currency is restored to par with gold. We cannot export our cotton manufactures as before the war, and why? Because our redundant and depreciated paper circulation makes our dollar of less value than the dollar of any other country, and thus enhances the cost of our fabrics by raising home prices. The people of the United States suffer great loss upon everything they send abroad, whether of agricultural or manufacturing production, and no time should be lost in calling upon Congress to authorize the funding of greenbacks until at par with specie, whether by direct conversion into bonds or indirectly into compound interest notes, convertible, after a given time, into such bonds. The latter is best, because the most easy and natural, but either will accomplish the object.”

THE WORLD'S IRON AND COAL PRODUCTION.—The world's annual production of cast or pig iron, is set down at 14,485,972 gross tons. In production, Great Britain leads the world, its production of pig iron, in 1873, being 6,566,451 tons. The United States, during the same year, produced 2,560,962. Germany comes next, with 1,664,802 tons in 1872, and France, with 1,381,000 tons, in 1873.

The annual production of coal throughout the world, for 1873, was 262,567,342. Great Britain heads the list, with 127,016,747 tons; the United States stands second, with 45,413,400 tons; Germany third, with 42,324,469; France fourth, with 16,500,000 tons. In 1872, Belgium produced 15,658,948 tons; Austria, 10,443,998, while the great Empire of Russia produced only 1,097,832 tons, a trifle more than Nova Scotia, which produced 1,051,467. The coal production of Germany has been more than doubled since 1862.

ELEMENTS OF STRENGTH IN THE REPUBLICAN PARTY

A safe proposition to lay down and challenge opposition, is that no dominant political party was ever wholly overthrown, except when an issue that every body could see and feel, was presented in antagonism thereto. What hope therefore, have the elements in conflict with the Republican party, for success? What issue do they present in conflict with the ruling ideas of the dominant political party of the country? What has the dominant party done to forfeit the confidence of the people? These are queries which we purpose scanning and answering:

1st. What hope have the elements in conflict with the Republican party for success? Surely none founded upon reason, or aught save prejudice and lust for office. Some, when questioned as to what they base their hopes upon, say that it is upon frauds perpetrated by Republican officials, and with apparent earnestness inquire if we deny that corruptionists have been revealed within the official fold of the Republican party? We answer, "No." But, coupled with our answer comes the question: "Who discovered and exposed the corruptionists?" There has not been an administration from that of Washington down to Grant, under which corruption has not shown its hideous head, and confronted the governing power. But notwithstanding the fact that not until the Republican party came into power, were opportunities for plunder so manifold, the Government has been, proportionately, more exempt from loss under Republican authority than while the Government was administered by any other party. The war and the condition of things resulting therefrom, occasioned the creation and maintenance of many more offices than were ever before known to our political system. The Republican party did not generate the necessity for these offices. Those opposed to the Republican party did, however, and the administrations following that of Buchanan confronted the war and its attendant incidents as necessity demanded. As a rule every corruptionist developed in the Republican party, has been drawn into the light by the hand of the party which clothed him with power or opportunity to steal, and in a majority of cases the Government has been made whole, and penitentiary doors have swung open to receive the peculators. We take it that if a son commits a theft of which his father has cognizance, and is handed over to the authorities by said parent for trial and punishment, complicity would not rightfully attach to the name of the family, however much disgrace the son might have brought upon himself and his own character. Fortunate would it have been for many Republicans, honored with positions of trust, had they never sought or accepted such places. They owe their fall to themselves, and their exposure to the party whose confidence they violated.

2d. What issue do they present in conflict with the ruling ideas of the dominant political party of the country? None; and it is a fact known to every political student, that no party in this country was ever overthrown, save on sharp and clearly defined issues, antagonistic to such party and in consonance with the sentiment of the people. The reader need but turn his mind's eye back to three years ago, when all the odds and ends were associated with the Democratic party, to disintegrate the Republican organization, but there being no principle to sustain them, and no issue save that founded upon personal or political prejudice, the attempt was impotent, covering the parties to the scheme with shame and confusion.

3d. What has the dominant party done to forfeit the confidence of the people? In all our reading from what falls from tongue or pen of those in antagonism to the Republican party, we have failed to note any substantiated charge of want of fealty by the Republican party to its pledges, or to the best interests of the country. Charges are not wanting against representatives of the party, from the President down to the humblest of his subordinates, but they are the offspring of hate and malice, bearing upon their face the impress of their origin. It matters not that the national debt, which the democracy were wont to say, could never and would never be lifted, has been materially reduced, diminished to an extent which demonstrates as well the capacity to pay it off, as the will and design of the party in power to pay it, and this too, while the work of unloading our people from the burthens of taxation has been going on. It matters not that every pledge in harmony with the platforms, upon which representatives of the party were elected, have been redeemed; still pencils are worn out, ink wasted and breath exhausted, in denouncing the men and party who and which deserve plaudits for preserving inviolate, their plighted faith. No, the Republican party has done nothing to forfeit the confidence of the people.

We argue from these premises, that the Republican party cannot and will not be defeated in 1876. Nor indeed, do we believe that its mission will be wholly fulfilled in 1880, nor until the life of professed and pronounced Republicans is as safe in the South as that of Democrats is and always has been at the North—and further, until the principles which underlie the organization, are accepted and illustrated by all the nations of the earth. It took well nigh a century for the seed sown by the Fathers of the Republic to spring forth, and it was only through the agency of the Republican party, that it fructified—that our country became in fact as in name, free, and we have faith to believe that the practical workings of a true Republic—a Republic founded upon the consent of the people—will spread and permeate until it takes hold upon all the governmental systems of the world.

CARPET BAGGERS.

Col. John Forsythe, of the Mobile Register, thinks that the old rebel element in the South made a mistake in holding aloof while reconstruction was in progress, and in ignoring the negro. The late owners of slaves let slip the opportunity to conciliate the freedmen when the war was over, and they possessed the rights of citizenship. Instead of smiling upon the colored man, who could cast a ballot for whom he pleased, the Southern gentlemen, who were above labor, stood upon the order of their gentility, abused the negro, and prophesied that he was so improvident that he must become extinct, or that there must be a war of races in which his extinction would be hastened by the delight his extinguishers would take in the work. When those gentlemen addressed themselves to affairs they found them complicated, and were much grieved that they had not assisted in the complication. But there was worse behind. They found the negro controlled by a lot of adventurers—carpet-baggers—who had educated him up to a distrust and dread of the gentlemen in all matters political, and who, by negro votes, were set up to misrule the State. “The negroes,” Col. Forsythe said, “always trusted us in all else; came to us for advice and for assistance when in trouble, and gave us their money to keep for them. But they were taught such terror of us that under no circumstances would they vote with us. This it was that forced upon us what you term the white line. We succeeded. Now they find they are not re-enslaved nor are their rights abridged, and we look for that line to disappear. But it will take some time.”

It will be observed that the Colonel spoke of the colored citizens dreading the old governing class so that they could not be induced to “vote with them.” And we think it possible that the idea might be extended, and include a determination not to vote for them or for any man who holds similar sentiments. At all events they may feel called upon to delay their support of the class in question, until they are assured that the colored people will receive fair play and protection at its hands—a trifling matter, perhaps, in the estimation of that class, but of vital importance to the negroes themselves. But the timidity of the negro is not altogether without cause, even if we take the bland expression of Col. Forsythe at its best interpretation. For a recent writer on the affairs of Alabama, in immediate connection with the statement of the gallant Colonel, puts on record that—"by no possible reconstruction can the white population of Alabama be reconstructed into a State like Massachusetts or Illinois. In considering their condition and progress, begin by dropping such notion."

Surely this is the key to the mystery! The colored citizens understand the political aspect of affairs in which their interests are involved. And in view of such a record as the above, the colored voters have abundant reasons to withhold their ballots from electing men who keep the State in continual agitation.

The epithet "carpet-bagger," and the opprobrium sought to be fastened in its application, mean nothing more than that a Republican stranger from another State, probably from the North, has exercised his right of citizenship in removing to the South. But there are some men who have removed to the South whom the bravest and most gallant of the whole army of gentlemen who fought for the lost cause would never dream of calling "carpet-baggers." Gov. Houston is a "carpet-bagger" in that sense, but no Southern gentleman would demean himself by calling him so. We learn that Houston, elected Governor on the white-line ticket, will be remembered among the politicians as having been a member of Congress from 1841 to 1861, with the exception of a single term, and as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee during Pierce's administration. He was a Douglas Democrat and an Anti-Secessionist up to the time of the war, and he withdrew from Congress in the year 1861, apparently following his State, as he supposed, out of the Union.

Now, Mr. Houston was born in Tennessee, and though he went to Alabama when young, he has never been charged with carpet-baggerism; and such a charge against him would never be brought. But if a Northern Republican went to Alabama with the intention of making it his home and living up to his principles, he would be a carpet-bagger, marked, to be ostracised. The difference is here. Mr. Houston fell into the arms of the governing class, who dry-nursed him to this day, because an exponent of its sentiments.

The crime of carpet-baggerism in the Northern Republican living South, is that he loves freedom strong enough to claim it for himself and for all men who have the rights of citizenship, because he believes that all men are equal in the eye of the law. For this he is a carpet-bagger. And yet the governing class, individually and collectively, say they are friends of the negro, and lament that he will not vote either with them or for them. Is the negro wise, or otherwise?

BOURBON DEMOCRACY wants reconciliation but it must be on a Democratic basis, or none at all. This is the way the Louisville Courier-Journal (Dem.) regards the situation:

The South is readier than the North to celebrate the national birthday. It is the Radical party that stands across the path, breathing hate and death, flourishing its bloody weapons and displaying—not the beautiful Star-Spangled Banner—emblem of liberty and law—but the black flag of subjugation, with skulls and cross-bones.

The Republican party was brought into existence to defend and maintain "the beautiful Star-Spangled Banner—emblem of liberty and law." When Bourbonism becomes reconciled to this banner, and the only issue before the country is, which party can best protect this "emblem of liberty and law," we shall have reached the true basis of reconciliation. For this "good time coming" the Republican party is earnestly laboring.

Nothing excels in wonder the bridge system of the West, all built up since the war. The Missouri is bridged at St. Charles, (3,535 feet long), Boonville, Kansas City, Leavenworth, Atchison, St. Joseph ($1,000,000), and Omaha. The cost of these bridges was about $11,000,000, or $3,000,000 less than the single bridge and approaches at St. Louis. The Ohio is bridged eight times below Pittsburg at a cost of $16,000,000. The Mississippi is bridged at St. Louis, Hannibal, Keokuk, Burlington, Clinton, Dubuque, Winona, La Crosse, St. Paul, and other places, at a cost of $25,000,000. An engineer said a few days ago that the bridges of the United States built since the war had cost $150,000,000. The great bridges at Saybrook, Albany, Havre de Grace, and Buffalo do not bear comparison with the bridge system of the West.

PUNIC FAITH.

The Missouri Constitutional Convention now about adjourning, has formed a Constitution for that State, which is certainly a remarkable instrument. It will be remembered that the Democracy of that State regained power by the help of some 50,000 Republicans. These voters, who believed that disenfranchisement was a two-edged weapon cutting either way, sacrificed their party organization to enforce that belief. By their action the State was transferred to that party, to which the voters alluded to, had always been opposed. Of this result no special complaint has been made. Indeed, it must have been foreseen. But, on the other hand, there comes the use made of the newly acquired power.

Some one has said of Americans with a brevity which has the soul and essence of wit in it, that—no people forget yesterday so readily. The Missouri Germans and other "Liberals" forgot it with a vengeance. The treason that had no excuse passed with them as if it had not been. The years of brutal propaganda which had been aroused against Kansas and its free-soil citizens; the hideous deeds which marked the daily record of proslavery and Confederate warfare in Missouri; the oaths that were wantonly violated;—all these and more, were forgotten. But the reward of such purblind action has not been wanting. How have the "Liberals" of Missouri been repaid by the rebel Democrats, whom their votes enfranchised?

The Convention to which reference is made is itself a striking reply. The majority of its delegates represented a considerable minority of the people. Its presiding officer was an ex-United States and ex-Confederate Senator whose boast is, that he is still "unreconstructed," and whose strongest speeches were made in opposition to free schools, to equal representation, and in favor of provisions looking to the indirect assertion to say the least, in the new "Bill of Rights," of the old heresies of State sovereignty and secession. The Convention has practically disfranchised the "Liberals," and with them not less than 250,000 of the population are cut off from the basis of apportionment.

Nowhere will criticism of this latter outrage be found in the Democratic press. Only, does the St. Louis Republican (Independent) characterize it in fitting terms, but the Democracy endorse it. "Anything to win" is their motto.

A most important illustration of the animus exhibited, and that on the vital topics of equal rights, the relations of the State and the Union, with all its important consequences, will be seen in the following review of certain sections in the present and proposed "Declaration of Rights."

It is provided in that portion of the present Constitution—

1. That all men are endowed with the inalienable right to life, liberty, the fruits of their own labor, and the pursuit of happiness.

The new declaration omits this important paragraph altogether, and in doing so it is the first step towards a planned and understood design to remove from the constitution of the State all the distinctive provisions by which paramount allegiance to the Union was set forth and enforced.

2. The present Constitution declares there shall be no slavery or involuntary servitude.

The new instrument omits this entirely. It was argued that it was surplusage, as the Federal Constitution provided the necessary barrier to any State action. But other omissions make this particular one of special significance.

3. The Declaration now controlling provides at length, against any civil disqualification except for crime, of any person on account of color. Such person is not to be debarred from the jury box, the courts, the schools, or otherwise unduly hindered in any way.

This section is also omitted from the new "Declaration of Rights."

4. Sections 4 in the present Declaration and Section 1 in the new instrument are identical and read as follows:

"That all political power is vested in and derived from the people; that all government of right originates from the people, is founded upon their will only, and is instituted solely for the good of the whole."

5. In section 5 of the present instrument it is declared :

"That the people of this State, have the inherent, sole and exclusive right to regulate the internal government and police thereof, and of altering and abolishing their Constitution and form of government whenever it may be necessary to their safety and happiness, but every such right sha'll be exercised in pursuance of law, and consistently with the Constitution of the United States."

Section 2, of the new Declaration reads to the italicized portions as above. Between the word "whenever" to "necessary" the new instrument substitutes the words, "they may deem it," so that it will read, "whenever they may deem it necessary"—an obvious difference, with a distinction quite in the line of the impotent treason that marks the whole effort. After the word "happiness," they add "provided such changes be not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States."

The foolish specimens of "Punic Faith," involved in the foregoing are readily understood. They are contemptible in character, and would not be worthy of notice, but for the fact that just such word-mongering formed a potent weapon to the conspirators who organized the "Slaveholders' Rebellion."

The next two sections in both documents are worthy careful scrutiny and comparison. Sections 6 and 7 of the present Declaration states—

"That this State shall ever remain a member of the American Union; that the people thereof are part of the American Nation; and that all attempts, from whatever source, or upon whatever pretext, to dissolve said Union, or to sever said Nation, ought to be resisted with the whole power of the State.

"That every citizen of this State owes paramount allegiance to the Constitution and Government of the United States, and that no law or ordinance of this State, in contravention or subversion thereof, can have any binding force."

There is no mistake in these declarations. The conscience of no citizen could be caught by them in the meshes of divided allegiance. Read now, and carefully, what it is proposed to substitute therefor :

"That Missouri is a free and independent State, subject only to the Constitution of the United States, and as the preservation of the State and the maintenance of their governments are necessary to an indestructible union and were intended to coexist with it, the legislature is not authorized to adopt, nor will the people of this State ever assent to any amendment or change of the Constitution of the United States which may in any wise impair the right of local self-government belonging to the people of this State."

"That constitutional government is intended to promote the general welfare of the people; that all persons have a natural right to life, liberty, and the enjoyment of the gains of their own industry; that to give the security to these things is the principal office of government, and that when government does not confer this security, it fails of its chief design."

The first section quoted is probably as plausible a piece of political Jesuitry as the brain of the ex-Rebel, Waldo P. Johnson, was capable of concocting from the olla podrida of Calhounism left therein. If any can, in the light of history, fail to see the intent, that one must be very obtuse. Missouri being a free and independent State, subject only to the Constitution of the United States," has the right to forbid the legislature "to adopt" and to declare ex cathedra, that "the people" of the said State will not "Assent to any amendment or change of the Constitution of the United States which may in any wise impair the right of local self-government belonging to the people of this State."

If this is any thing else than another method of proclaiming the right of nullification, there is then no force in language.

Suppose it happen hereafter that a Constitutional majority of the States should ratify an amendment to the Federal Constitution, the operation of which the Bourbons of Missouri might consider as impairing the "right of local self-government," what would they do about it, under such a declaration as the foregoing? Had they been in power, and this section had been in the State Constitution at the time of the adoption of the last three amendments to the Federal Constitution, it is to be presumed they would again have attempted the "sovereign right of resistance," and declared that supreme allegiance in such a contingency was due the State and not the Union. The section, apart from its mischievousness is an impertinence, in that it undertakes to deny the future right of the people or the Legislature of the State to "assent

o changes in the Constitution of the United States," in the manner provided for in that instrument itself, or to intimate that changes will ever be proposed, such as may "impair the right of self-government."

The other section speaks for itself. It is an attempt under the form of trustful common place enunciations, to justify to the citizens of Missouri, those political teachings with which Democratic speeches and writings are now so rife. In other words the solemn jargonology of a State Constitution, in its Declaration of Rights, is used to testify that the general government has failed to confer that security to do which is "the principal office of government;" that therefore the people of Missouri are practically absolved from allegiance, and need only wait fitting opportunity to make it manifest. And in order that this may more clearly appear, the declaration of "paramount allegiance," which every citizen owes "to the Constitution and Government of the United States" is to be wholly expunged from the instrument.

These people are mischievous rascals. They are playing with fire only to be themselves consumed. But the lesson taught by their puny faith, their shameless dishonesty, sustained as it is by the Democratic party, must not be overlooked by those who are loyal and true, or forgotten at the ballot-box by those who are asked to add forgiveness to their virtues, and trust this forsworn party with renewed power to again betray the country.

CONSISTENCY A JEWEL.

Since the accession of the Republican party to power the Democratic party proper has been consistent in its opposition to the every tenet of the Republican party. But if there is anything in the signs of the times, it is evident that they are now divided upon a vital issue—that of finance. Take, for instance, the State of Ohio. Here we find Pendleton and Thurman pulling in opposite directions, one favoring rag money and the other "money that chinks," as they express it in Buckeye parlance. Pendleton, however, is consistent with himself, while Thurman is inconsistent. The two Democratic gladiators were present at their State convention, and each strove to have his financial ideas incorporated in the platform. Pendleton succeeded in his designs, and Thurman was frustrated in his, thus reversing the old adage, and showing that a dead dog was greater than a living lion. The Pendletonian policy was presented to the people of the nation in 1864, when its author ran for Vice-President on the same ticket with Gen. McClellan, and particularly in 1868, when Pendleton was a candidate for the Democratic nomination for the Presidency. He was disappointed in securing the empty honor, but successful in having his ideas of financial economy incorporated in the platform of the party, vaguely it is true, but made plain and unmistakable by his own speeches as well as those made by Vallandigham and others of his henchmen. Let us go back to the record. The Democratic platform upon which Seymour and Blair stood said:

"Where the obligations of the Government do not expressly state upon their face, or the law under which they were issued does not provide that they shall be paid in coin, they ought, in right and in justice, to be paid in the lawful money of the United States."

The lawful money of the United States was said, by Pendleton & Co., to be greenbacks, whereas the Republicans took the position that greenbacks were but the issue of a military necessity. The Republicans on attaining power inherited from their predecessors a war upon which hinged the life of the nation, and an empty treasury. The soldiery had to be paid, and in the absence of money the Government issued its notes—greenbacks—which the sold-lien of "money that chinks" sentative of such money.

Now how did the Repub issue then? By resolving:

"We denounce all forms as a national crime; and th requires the payment of the ness in the utmost good faith to all creditors at home and abroad, not only according to the letter, but the spirit of the laws under which it was contracted."

In all the speeches delivered and letters written by Pendleton in 1868 and prior, he took the position that the 5-20 bonds should be redeemed (?) in greenbacks, the greenbacks not to be redeemable in coin. Lincoln and Johnson beat Seymour and Blair when this greenback issue was presented, nearly half a million on the popular vote; and on the 16th day of December, 1869, the following resolution was introduced in Committee of the Whole in the House of Representatives, by Mr. Garfield, and received 124 yeas to one nay, the negative vote being Thomas L. Jones, of Kentucky.

"Resolved, That the proposition, direct or indirect, to repudiate any portion of the debt of the United States is unworthy of the honor and good name of the nation; and that this House, without distinction of party, hereby sets its seal of condemnation upon any and all such propositions."

This resolution was aimed at the Pendletonian idea that greenbacks were money, and that the payment of a claim in greenbacks by the United States was a liquidation of such indebtedness.

True, there were then as there are now, men who indulged in the philosophy that owing to the heavy debt which menaced the nation, it would be expedient to declare greenbacks to be money. In ancient times money was represented in some countries by salt, in others by iron, etc., and Biblical history tells us of patriarchs paying for property in oxen, not as barter, but oxen had a standard value. But we have passed beyond the day when value had no true and fixed measure. Now all civilized countries recognize gold as the standard representative of true value. And right here we are led to remark that people are apt to argue that inasmuch as the supply of gold is so limited, compared to the demands of business for money that we can never arrive at a specie basis. How is it in England? How was it in this country in years anterior to the war, when paper money oftentimes demanded a premium over gold? There and then monetary value did not fluctuate, gold was the standard and paper the representative of coin value. As well argue that because there is not provender sufficient in the world to supply the inhabitants thereof with the wants of a lifetime for consumption at one meal, that the earth could not yield sufficient to supply ordinary demands, as that there need be gold sufficient available to represent the wealth of the world. There are none who advocate the abrogation and annihilation of paper money, but there are those—and we believe they comprise a majority of the people of this Union—who favor confining the issue of paper money to the demands of trade and commerce, and within the bounds of possible and probable redemption in the money of the world.

Some argue that owing to the pressure of the times it is expedient to increase the volume of rag money and cease looking to a resumption of specie payment. But we argue that such increase would not be honest, and further, that what is dishonest is inexpedient. The Government has all along pledged its faith to the resumption of its bonds in money, and the taking up of one note by giving therefor another, is not redemption by a nation, any more than a like procedure on the part of an individual would be business-like and honorable.

The Ohio platform, of which mention has been made, asserts that "the contraction of the currency heretofore made by the Republican party, and the further contraction proposed by it, with a view to forced resumption of specie payment, has already brought disaster to the business of the country, and threatens it with general bankruptcy and ruin." This clause is neither Democratic nor true. It is not Democratic, for the reason the Republican party invented the greenback policy, and adopted it over the protest of the Democracy. It is not true, because the Republicans first expanded the currency, and in contracting, are but endeavoring to attach the country to moorings which the Democracy sought the Republicans not to depart from. Before the war the only lawful money was gold, silver and copper, and the Republicans are but endeavoring to return to the "good old days," for which modern Democracy so often sigh. But the Democracy of Ohio insist on the issue of more promises to pay value, without making provision for a redemption of the pledge, or creation of the value. Time was when the "twin relics of barbarism" were understood to be slavery and polygamy; now they are recognized by the Democracy of Ohio, as gold and silver.

Now, let us see how William Allen, the candidate of the Ohio Democracy for Governor, stands upon this question. A quarter of a century ago he was a member of the U. S. Senate, and used the following sound argument:

"One clause of the Constitution expressly declares that Congress shall coin money and regulate the value of foreign coin.

Another clause declares that no State shall make anything a legal tender, except gold and silver; and I take it for granted that no man will assert that Congress should do what no State is permitted to do."

But now we find Allen indorsing the platform made for him by the leaders of his party in Ohio, notwithstanding that, in a speech made since his nomination, referring to his career in the U. S. Senate, he said he had never uttered a word or thought, as Senator, which he would reverse.

The only vital and vitalizing resolution in the Ohio platform spoken of, is that pertaining to finance, and here we find representative Democrats, like unto Allen and Thurman, accepting that. Consistency is said to be a jewel, which, if true, proves that Allen and Thurman are not fond of jewels.

BOURBON RECONSTRUCTION.

The progress of Democratic retroaction is worthy close observation. Just now, three Southern States are discussing the election of delegates to Constitutional Conventions. These States are North Carolina, Alabama, and Texas. The country is not left in doubt as to the purposes sought through the convening of these bodies. As a naturalist is able to frame the skeleton of an unknown animal from one bone, so the whole process can be illustrated by any one preceding example. If any difficulty could be experienced, the conditions now existing in Missouri, where a Democratic convention is engaged in framing a new State Constitution, would leave none. In that body, called under an ingenious system of "gerrymandering," so that a minority of the people could dictate to the majority thereof, the public school system has been assailed, and its efficiency will be greatly impaired. Under similar motives, the territorial idea of representation in place of population, has been so incorporated that not only have a minority of 844,849 persons; living in 90 counties, been given 38 members more than a majority numbering 876,806, living in 24 counties, but the system will require these latter to increase their population over one million persons before they can have an equal share in the government of the State. It is barely possible that the entire instrument will be rejected at the polls, but that is almost too much to hope for in a State where there is a Democratic majority. This majority owes its present position to the fifty thousand or more Republican votes that in 1871 divided their party, in order to remove disqualifying provisions from the Constitution of that date.

If we go back to Democratic reconstructions that have become accomplished facts, what shall we see? The present condition of Arkansas is bruited abroad as being so much better than in the pre-Democratic period. Nordhoff & Co. haste to tell us of the good order and industry that prevails. It is to be feared that the peace is in some degree akin to that which is said to have existed in Warsaw. Of the industry no doubt exists. But Arkansas is "restored"—that's the phrase—to the direction of its "proper leaders." The "Garland," as the new State Constitution is called, provides that "the State shall ever maintain a general, suitable and efficient system of free schools," but the Democratic Legislature that succeeded, appears to have done nothing to carry out this provision, and has done some things whereby the school system then in existence has been injured greatly. The State Super-

The National Banks, prior to May 1, 1871, paid to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a license, or special tax, of two dollars on each $1,000 of capital, and an income-tax on net earnings to December 31, 1871. The special or license-tax, from May 1, 1864, to May 1, 1871, amounted to $5,322,688; the income-tax, from March 1, 1869, to September 1, 1871, amounted to $5,539,289. The total amount of tax paid to the Government by the National Banks, from the organization of the system to July 1, 1874, is, therefore, $68,580,595.

It is evidence, therefore, from the exaction of such an amount, that Congress did not intend that National Banks should be allowed to escape taxation, or a fair share of it; and the payment of the money into the Treasury is gratifying, as showing the confidence of the people in the system of National Banking.

"I WAS ALWAYS A DEMOCRAT."

We frequently meet with men who say, "I was always a Democrat, and am one now." They appear to look upon attaches to a political party as England was wont to look upon citizenship, "Once, an Englishman always an Englishman," to consider that the professor of a certain political faith could not renounce it, nor withdraw his allegiance from the party he originally joined. Occasionally we meet with gentlemen who served with credit in the late war, and on the Union side, thus account for re-attaching themselves to the Democratic party. To us the point of argument is very attenuated and wanting in force. Surely no man of reading, experience and ordinary understanding will pretend to deny that the Democratic party plunged the nation into the vortex of war in 1861. It will not do to say that the masses of that party were hostile to disunion. A party is at all times responsible for the action of its administrators, and certainly it will be admitted that the representative Democrats of this country, North as well as South, i. e., a majority of them, were either openly or secretly in sympathy with the the disunion projects. Douglas and a few others were honorable exceptions, but he and they withdrew from the party when it threw its weight in the scale for the dissolution of our Government. Douglas, in his last speech at Chicago, made on the first day of the month of May, 1861, the last month of his life, in closing, after showing the conspiracy in which the Democratic leaders had been engaged in involving the country in a civil war, and declaring that the election of Lincoln was but a pretext, said:

"But this is no time for detail of causes. The conspiracy is now known; armies have been raised, war is levied to accomplish it. There is only two sides to the question. Every man must be for the United States or against it. There can be no neutrals in this war, only patriots or traitors."

As early as January 6, 1860, Franklin Pierce, Buchanan's predecessor as President, in a letter to Jefferson Davis, gave evidence that he was privy to the scheme of attempted dissolution of the Union, saying:

"If through the madness of Northern Abolitionists that dire calamity (war) must come, the fighting will not be along Mason and Dixon's line merely."

He then went on to predict that in all Northern cities the war would be waged. Pierce was considered a pretty good Democrat, and a Northern one—aye, a New England one at that.

Jeff Davis, with crocodile tears in his eyes, withdrew from the United States Senate on the 21st of January, 1861, in order to take his position as leader of the revolting hosts when the revolution was ripe. He, too, was considered a pretty good Democrat.

D. L. Yulee telegraphed his people in January, 1861, that the Democratic Senators and Representatives were occupying their positions in Congress simply to tie the hands of Republicans and prevent the passage of force bills, etc., which would enable the Republican administration to resist the designs of the seceders. Yulee was a Democratic United States Senator from Florida.

Fernando Wood, then as now, a Democrat, favored early in 1861, in a communication which he addressed as Mayor of New York to the Council of his city, that steps be taken to secede from the State, and said that much could be said in favor of the justice and policy of the measures being taken by the South to dissolve the Union.

We might go on and quote pages of evidence to prove that leading Democrats, North as well as South, were pledged, prior to the breaking out of the late war, to recognize the right of the insurgents to bring war on the Union, while challenging the production of any Republican of '61. who by word or deed gave aid or comfort to the enemies of our Government and Union. But our only object is to demonstrate that the declaration of war made by the Democrats of the South, and the sympathy given them by the leaders of that party in the North, justly forfeited respect and attachment of loyal men for and to that political organization, while the war itself obliterated all party lines, leaving none, as Douglas expressed it, but patriots and traitors. The party in charge of the honor and perpetuity of the nation at the time they were in peril was the Republican party. True, there were those who had heretofore affiliated and acted with the Democratic party, who sympathized with and fought for the Union, but in so doing were not in harmony with their party. On the contrary, a majority of such openly abjured and renounced the party.

Then again there is no question now at issue between the political parties of the country which divided them before the war; hence the absurdity of men claiming that because they were members of the Democratic party before and up to the breaking out of the late war, they should, forsooth, renew their allegiance to it now. The fact is, there is nothing left of the old party but its name, and that has been smirched and made odorous of treason.

The Republican party of to-day stands as in '61 and '65, pledged to the indissolubility of the Union, and equal rights to all men under the law. That is the only question which in the years named divided the Republican and Democratic parties. Then the Democratic party denied the power in the Government to coerce the South; in other words, insisted that the right of self-preservation was not inherent in the Government of the United States. The Republican party asserted and affirmed the right, and "fought it out on that line" for four summers and as many winters. All other questions of a political character at issue between the Republican and Democratic parties, have sprung up since the war, and have no relation to parties anterior to the rebellion. How foolish then for a man to argue that he is a Democrat now because he was a Democrat in ante bellum days.

It has been said by some sage, "Wise men change, fools never." As time rolls on, new principles evolve and new duties present themselves. Parties are but the consolidation of individuals holding views in common, and while such individuals may hold similar views upon a vital issue to-day, it does not, or should not, follow that they will think in unison on all questions which may arise in the future. The writer of this article has been a Republican from the formation of the party, but he would not permit himself to resolve, far less to openly declare, that he would always be found voting the Republican ticket. But so long as the party first organized or victory by Abraham Lincoln is confronted by the "putrid reminiscence," the Democratic party, marshaled by men who refused to hold up the hands of the martyred President, and whose names are reminders of chilling sentences rhetorically poured down the galled backs of the brave "boys in blue," we will not hesitate to say that such party and such men cannot afford refuge or companionship for him. The Democracy of to-day is made up of the same material which composed it in former days. Then it was controlled in the interest of one section, and in antagonism to another. Per contra, the Republican party is professedly and practically the friend and champion of the whole people, and invites within its folds all who love Republican institutions, and revere the Union as their mother and each patriot as a brother.

DEMOCRATIC lawyers in Philadelphia have publicly indicated their intention to support a republican candidate for a local judgeship, and the democratic organ is shocked at such conduct.

PATRIOTISM.

The careful student of history knows that the records of names and dates, however valuable, can never yield him the instruction at which he aims. He must regard history as the outspread chronicle of human thought, for while thought may appear very evanescent, it is thought which lies at the foundation of and controls all human actions. Our fathers determined to build up a nation upon this continent, the elements of which they designed to bind together with an indissoluble bond. They had all the events of the world before them as sources of instruction; and they drew inspiration from the best examples and the wisest masters. History to them was the science of the human mind and of human nature. Men and women were but ideas clothed with flesh and blood, who, in working out their destiny left the pathway they traveled clearly shown. Trains of thought were observed to mark particular periods. Principles were seen to spring from leading minds and prevail as public opinion. And as ideas controlled actions, so principles shaped events.

It has been said that particular eras and particular nations have, indeed, been the embodiment of some one great idea of which their most energetic political institutions and their most massy material structures have been, not the creators, but the creatures. Rome's magnificent architectures and massy bulwarks, her imperial roads, nay, her capital itself, resplendent with the trophies of a conquered world, to the outward eye, no doubt, presented an aspect of solidity infinitely more striking than any abstract idea or bodiless principle ever could present to the eye of the most vivid faith. Yet, what laid her walls as firm, apparently, as the earth's foundations, and reared her battlements, menacing the earth with haughty supremacy? It was one grand, all-absorbing idea, which for centuries filled the heart of every Roman and of Rome, subordinating to itself every other thought and feeling, and straining every nerve to a pitch of self-devotion and enthusiasm which nothing within or without could withstand. It formed her national faith, to which, whoever was heretic was not Roman. That idea which created all her greatness, was, in one word, PATRIOTISM. The supremacy of that idea was subsequently lost in superstition, which, again was observed by our fathers to be relaxing its hold; and they revived in this glorious Republic the idea of PATRIOTISM and beheld the dawn of a new idea—that of the EQUALITY OF MAN, which has been reserved for Republicans of this age to establish in the Constitution and the laws.

But what would the Fathers say of the Democracy? For their lack of patriotism they would denounce them as heretics, anti-Americans, with no love of country, inasmuch as, with a good name, they sanctioned and supported slavery, encouraged the rebellion, and promised the rebels 50,000 armed allies from the city of New York alone. The Democratic party, through ex-President Pierce, in his letter to Jefferson Davis, promised also that "the fighting will not be along Mason and Dixon's line merely. It will be within our own borders, in our streets, between the two classes of citizens"—meaning Abolitionists and Democrats. Democrats confessed too, that they had no faith in the Union—the apple of the eye with the fathers in the political fabric—and were willing to let the South destroy it, while denouncing the efforts of the North for its preservation. As to the equality of man—the colored man being admitted to citizenship as one of the issues of the war—the Democratic party is still of the same heretical sentiment. It cannot change. It would bring the negro again under the control of his late master. Gerritt Smith said truly that the war is not over; nor will it ever be until the Democratic party is dead. Only at the death of this party will the evil spirit that has dwelt in it and inspired it for half a century go out of it.

And who will deny the fearfully destructive heresy so outspoken in the Democratic party, and illustrated in its demand to pay the interest on the national bonds in greenbacks, instead of gold, and in its financial theories of inflation. The few upright men in that party, who see the fraud and folly of such a proceeding, cannot control the Democratic masses, and must therefore yield to the sheer force of numbers. Advocates of the Pendletonian heresy are numerous and active to-day, seemingly unaware that they are aiming at the destruction of the credit of the nation, by procuring repudiation of the national debt. Every national security is injured at home and abroad. And the tendency to invest the savings of people in bonds, is not only restrained, but a spirit of fear and alarm is raised among foreign holders which has induced many to part with their bonds, or to send them back to America for sale. The great financial markets of Europe are incessantly struck at from the United States, as if the people were really behind the movement, intent upon destruction or inflicting incalculable evil. But who are the men who strike—who are the authors of this great disaster? They are the leaders of the Democratic party, whose reckless theories would have wrecked the nation but for the honor and patriotism of Republicans. For the Republican party is altogether free from the financial heresies of the inflation Democracy; and it has used its influence in building up the national credit until the national bonds command a premium.

The case therefore stands thus: The Democratic party embraced the heresy of human slavery and supported the claims of the slave-owners. The Democratic party believed in the heresy of secession, and went as far as it dared to aid the Rebellion. And every prominent rebel was a prominent Democrat. The Democratic party sustained the heresy that the war for the Union was a failure while the armies of the Union were conquering the rebels. The Democratic party opposed the measures to raise money to save the country; and since the war was ended has labored to keep alive the old spirit of intolerance and discontent among the late masters, which prevents the healing of discord in the South, and the full realization by the South of the prosperity within its reach if peace prevailed. In all this the Democratic party has proved itself to be a party so ingrained with heresy that it has lost sight of the patriotism and teachings of the fathers, and abandoned the cause of the patriot.

On the other hand, the Republican party accepted the teachings of the fathers—believed in the preservation of the Union at any hazard—and preserved it. Republican statesmen toiled to carry out the ideas of the founders of the Republic, and have written on the statute book the equality of all men before the law. Republican statesmen have learned from experience, and introduced measures to prepare the way for specie payments, and to raise the paper currency to the value of gold. In a word, Republicans have looked with reverent eyes on the evidence of the patriotism of men, who, a century ago pledged their lives, fortune, and sacred honor in founding the Union as the natural home of human freedom, intelligence and political integrity. And in all the details of legislation and administration, in war and in peace, Republicans have looked out from the ceaseless task of political adjustment so incessantly opposed by the heresies of the Democratic party to the certainty of the patriotism of their acts, and to the proud satisfaction that in spite of their mistakes sometimes, because they were mortal, they were at heart patriots, and that the nation would accord their claim without dispute—without hesitation.

THE German citizen is generally right on the vital political issues of the day. At a German Club in the city of New York, the following resolution was recently adopted without a dissenting voice:

Resolved, That, in view of the monstrous doctrines advocated in the platforms of the Democratic conventions in Ohio and Iowa, we implore our German brethren in those States to vote as one man against the party that favors financial inflation, and by its attitude, endangers our free school system.

IF President Grant had attended the races at Long Branch, every Democratic paper from Maine to California, would have noted the fact. But he only attended camp-meeting, and it is safe to say that no Democratic journal will devote a line to the visit. Race course reports travel with the speed of lightning, while camp-meeting ones seldom get beyond the lips of the person who utters them. This may be accounted for by the fact that Democratic reporters are seldom found at camp-meetings.

THE LOUISIANA CENSUS.

In illustration of the present condition of this State, the following statement of the enumeration under the current census, of a representative parish—that of Plaquemine—is significant. The total population by the national census in 1870, was 10,462. That of 1875, foots up to 11,882, a total increase of 1,420, or a ratio of about seven and one-third per cent.

The colored population in 1870, was stated at 6,838; in 1875, it is 8,196, an increase of 1,358, leaving only 60 additional persons to the other class. Of these 27 are Chinese, as there were none named of that race living in the parish at the enumeration of 1870. The total number of foreigners in 1870, was 917; in 1875, the total is but 572, of whom 185 are not naturalized. The total number entitled to vote is 3,038 or about one in 3.9. There are 1,971 white males, and 4,154 colored.

Of those who can read, there are 2,613 persons, being

White	2,295
Colored	318

-------------	-------

who are classified as

Males	1,511
Females	1,102

Those who cannot read are

Whites	675
Colored	6,282

-------------	-------

and are found to be

Males	3,634
Females	3,323

There are 9 schools in the parish with 379 pupils, while there are 3,879 children of the legal school age, i. e., between six and twenty-one. To accommodate them all would give 431 scholars to each school-house, now crowded with an average of 42 pupils.

Its area includes 21,750 acres of improved land, and 63,357 acres unimproved. There were 482 children born therein during 1874.

Taking the parish of Plaquemine and the increase it shows, as a basis for an estimate of the present population of Louisiana, and the result will be about as follows:

In 1870—

Whites	362,065
Colored	364,210
Indians	569
Chinese	71

-------------	---------

Leaving out the last two classes, it was 726,275. An increase of six per cent.—that of Plaquemine parish is over seven—would give to the State an additional population of nearly, or quite, 50,000. The increase for the ten years embraced by the ninth census, was 18,913. For the preceding decade, however, it was 190,460. The difference is plainly traceable to the devastating influence of the Democratic war for slavery, to the loss of life consequent thereon, as well as to the hindrance to emigration it created, and the other causes arising from the absence in camps of the larger portion of the male population, which need not be discussed here. The probability is, that the present decade will show a much larger proportionate increase than did that from 1850 to 1860.

There is another point indicated by the Plaquemine figures. The charge has been frequently made during the past two years, in the discussions arising over Louisiana affairs, that there was practically a fraudulent enumeration, by which the colored population was largely over-stated. There seems to be nothing especially noticeable in the parish of Plaquemine, by which to account for the large increase of colored inhabitants. The figures indicate that there at least no over-statement was made, but rather the contrary. If the increase in the State should be one half as great as it appears to be in the parish named, the colored population will, in 1880 have reached a total of over 400,000—a ratio of increase which will make them more largely outnumber the whites than at present, and of course insure the success of Republican principles. But, without doubt, a considerable portion of the increase in the parish of Plaquemine, is due to increased industrial activity, which attracts labor to the sugar region of which it is a part. The figures confirm the statements that have been made in relation to the migration of colored persons, to the rich lands of the Mississippi, and Red River valleys. Just now the "color line" hostility is found most marked in the four States to which it is believed this migration tends: Arkansas, Mississippi, Louisiana and Alabama. It is quite active in the second and fourth named. Not, however, on the part of the colored people or Republicans generally, but the reverse. The indications are strong in proof of the theory which has been broached, that in the valleys named, there will be a marked concentration of the colored race. If so, it will grow out of two causes—climatic conditions and fitness, and the persecution endured elsewhere, which make the people seek the safety of numbers. But the immediate motive is the material activity that exists. Free Labor pays, and the sugar planters have found out the fact, by the demand for its products.

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY AND THE WORKING MEN.

The people for the most part are honest and earnest, comprehend generally the meaning of things and wish to do right. But the people are sometimes deceived by appearances, and all that is necessary is to "explain the fact" in order that they may act intelligently and upon just principles. There never was a greater fraud perpetrated upon the Nation than the assumption of the word "Democratic" by the party using it. The true principles of Democracy, as understood politically in this country, were never the principles of Democrats. The Democratic party is Democratic in name only, and not in practice; for a Democratic Government means a Government of and by, and in the interests of the people. Not so the Government of the Democratic party. While it must secure power by popular vote, when power has been obtained, the Democratic party has instantly turned on its supporters, and introduced class-legislation of the most stringent kind—legislation in direct antagonism to the interests of labor and the workingman. Compare the promises of the Democratic party with the record of its acts, and it will be found that it has belied them in almost every instance. The secret is, it made the promises with no intention of keeping them; because they were promises knowingly built upon untruth. In the City of New York, the Democratic party charged the financial condition of the country to the Republican party; and promised to make money abundant if the party triumphed. Working men believed it, and added their vote to swell the vote of the great foreign body of ignorant Catholics, at the bidding of the Romish priests who sold it for value received to the Democratic leaders. But what has the Democratic party done? Has it relieved the merchants and manufacturers of the pressure upon them, and made money easy? Nothing of the kind. And the Democratic platforms of Ohio and Indiana, show the party is willing to plunge its dupes still deeper in the mire, by clamoring for "more money," which means inflation of the currency which is now at a discount and irredeemable, and which if more was issued would increase the cost of everything that speculators might be rich, while the earnings of the working man would purchase much less. Having failed to remedy financial distress as promised, it did have the opportunity of employing the working men in New York city, at wages for their labor, on which their families could be supported. But the Democratic party had neither honor nor good intention towards the working man. And when the Democratic leaders were pressed to give employment to more than they could fairly pay, they did not hesitate to cut down wages so low that the workmen could not live on them.

The people of Connecticut are industrious and intelligent, and not unfamiliar with the record of the Democratic party. Yet a year or two ago, through the apathy and neglect of Republicans to go to the polls, the Democratic party came into power. Then it began to demonstrate that as a party it is not in favor of the people—the Democracy. It said it was a party of retrenchment and reform. A party so much in need of reformation itself, was not likely to initiate measures which the historian would classify as useful and beneficial to the State. So the historic page of reform by the Democratic party in Connecticut, stands in that connection, an absolute blank. But its system of retrenchment is as fraudulent as its name. Reduction of taxation can never be successful, unless accompanied by a reduction in expenditure. This, however, formed no part of its plan; and the consequence was, that the deficiency must be made up. How the deficiency occurred and how it was made up, we learn from the Lansing Republican. It says:

"For political clap-trap, the Democratic government of Connecticut, two years ago, cut down the State levy from two mills to one on the $1. They sounded it abroad as 'reform and economy.' But there was no real retrenchment; and now, to meet the necessary current expenses of the State, they have had to levy additional taxes. First they strike the savings banks for about $100,000, although these little hoards of the poor now pay more than their just proportion. They let off the railroads and insurance companies, which are wielded by heavy capitalists and make enormous profits, with just half the tax they formerly paid. This specimen of Democratic 'reform' is troubling the party a good deal in Connecticut."

The people of Connecticut ought to be troubled, particularly Republicans. To have been placed at the mercy of the Democratic Bourbon party—the proclaimed enemy of the working man—and by their own acts too, is a true cause for trouble. And if Republicans do not bestir themselves and throw off the incubus which is keeping the State from its legitimate advancement and prosperity, the people outside will stand aghast at their forbearance to their own injury—at their lack of shrewdness and determination, at a period which loudly calls for the exercise of both. We hope the Republican party will put forth its best efforts to rescue the State from Democratic domination; for it seems so natural that Connecticut should be Republican, that we can hardly imagine how it was possible it ever sunk into the control of the Democratic party. A wise and vigorous preparation, followed by united action, will assure a Republican victory.

EXCLUSIVE EDUCATION.—High schools are provided for the white children in the larger cities of Georgia, Alabama and Louisiana, under the common school systems of those States, but the colored children are not allowed to attend, nor are any provided for them. In Louisiana the law otherwise declares, but social influence and persecution have been sufficient as yet to prevent its enforcement. Yet the colored people all pay the poll tax, which is a large share of the school fund, and also pay other taxes. In Georgia they are two-fifths of the population and receive one-fifth of the school fund. In Louisiana they are one-half at least, and in Alabama they are three-sevenths of the whole.

MINING ACCIDENTS.—The average of fatal mining accidents in England and Wales during 1874 was one in 602 of all persons employed in or about the mines, and one death by accident among every 510 persons. 157,222 tons of minerals were got for each fatal accident, 133,251 tons for each death. In the preceding year (1873) the fatal accidents and the number of deaths from such accidents were more numerous in proportion to the number of persons employed, there being one accident among 526 persons, and one death among 479. In proportion to the weight of minerals raised, the figures for 1873 showed one accident for 146,867 tons, and one death for 133,677 tons. In Scotland there were in all 126 deaths, while the number of accidents was larger in proportion than in England.

CHURCHES AND SCHOOLS.—The American Missionary Association, whose labors are mostly in the South and among the colored people there, have fifty-two churches in the old slave States; seven universities and colleges; seventeen normal and graded high schools, as well as thirteen others, besides a force of 250 teachers and missionaries. The total number of students under their instruction is 11,744, of whom 2,017 are in the higher institutions.

Four ladies have been nominated in California as County Superintendents of Education.

ENEMIES OF FREE GOVERNMENT.

“Government of the People, for the People, by the People,” as Abraham Lincoln so wisely and sententiously described the Republican form—is always in danger from that ignorance which is not merely illiterate, but shuts out all the widening influences of active knowledge, by repressing enterprise and barring the road to liberalizing influences.

The world’s history is full of the most damning proofs of this statement. Our own land has been drenched in fratricidal blood, in order to make it apparent. Yet, in the face of these things, the powers of darkness rally to renewed attacks on the free school system—that agency which is potent to stimulate intelligence and able to make men and women capable of self-government. There are various forces at this terrible work. For present purposes, the one to be dealt with is more immediately formidable.

The illiteracy of the South is alarming. Not only have the former adult slaves grown up in abject ignorance, but a whole decade has passed during which little or no effort was made to secure the education of the generation of whites then growing up. A war, the merciless conscription to sustain which, almost robbed the cradle and the grave, and “swept the male youth to the camp and the battle-field.” The secession insanity plundered the school funds to sustain the armies of the Confederacy. So feeble were all attempts at public schools in the South before the civil war, that swept them out of existence, and left the rising generation without the most ordinary means of education. Not until 1869 and 1870 was there a revival, or rather a creative effort made.

The Republican party established a free school system in each one of the ex-Confederate States. They embodied provisions in the Constitution under which Congress readmitted them to representation. Those systems exist, and have grown to increasing usefulness, to just the extent that the Democracy has failed to re-secure control of any State. Wherever such control has been obtained, an attack on the common schools has followed. They cannot be entirely broken down, but they have been greatly impaired.

Yet the need is very great. Let us look at the facts. The following table exhibits the danger:

PERSONS OVER TEN YEARS OF AGE WHO CANNOT READ.

Section.	Total Population.	Cannot Read.
Eastern and Middle States, (including foreigners)..	12,303,534	17,806
Western States, (including foreigners)	12,023,629	409,175
Southern States, (including foreigners)	13,878,435	3,550,425

Thus 25.5 per cent. of the population of that age, in the South, are illiterate, against 3.8 per cent. in the Eastern and Middle, and 3.4 in the Western States.

Again, taking the total of the male population of voting age, and it will be found that of those who cannot read, the Eastern and Middle States have 226,592; the Western 217,403; the Southern 1,137,303, or, in other words, there are 39 per cent. of the Southern voters who are illiterate, as against 8 per cent. in the other two sections.

As to the cost, the reports of the Bureau of Education furnishes the materials for the following comparison:

SECTION.	POPULATION.	EXPENDED FOR EDUCATION.
Eastern and Middle States	12,303,534	$32,451,601
Western States.	12,023,629	34,828,628
Southern States.	13,878,435	11,176,344

From this table it appears that the Southern States, with a population larger than either of the other sections, expend only about one-third the amount.

The per capita comparison is even more striking. Taking the population between 6 and 16 as the basis, and the rate is as follows:

IN THE NORTH : Massachusetts, the highest $21.74. Maine, the lowest $6.57.

IN THE SOUTH : Maryland the highest $6.55. North Carolina, the lowest .62.

Thus the lowest expenditure per capita in any Northern State is higher than the highest in the South ; while the lowest in the South is only the fraction of a dollar !

Yet with these terrible facts staring them in the face, Southern Democrats are still defiant of and hostile towards the common school system. Light breaks in various directions. That is to be seen, but the general tone is one of prevailing hostility, not only to negro instruction, but to free schools. Yet, according to the census of 1870, there were in the Southern section nearly 284,000 illiterate whites between the ages of 15 and 21, while of white adults there were 797,000, making a total above the age of 15 of not less than 1,081,000 who were then growing up in ignorance. Hostility to common schools and general education does not then find its only genesis in colorphobia. It goes back of race and partizan policies, and strikes at the fundamental conditions by which alone "government of the people, by the people, for the people," can exist. The Southern Democrats and all others who oppose the common school system are the deliberate and intentional enemies of free Government.

NOBLE SENTIMENTS OF MR. LINCOLN.—The following extract from a letter written by President Lincoln, August 26, 1863, will be read with interest. It brings vividly before the mind the many obstacles which were placed in the way of those who were devoted to the Union. Mr. Lincoln could do nothing to strengthen the army, or encourage the country, without drawing upon himself the fire of Democratic criticism. The patience with which he endured it, the noble magnanimity with which he answered it, the hopeful spirit which lifted him above its range, are all shown in the language which follows :

"You say you will not fight to free negroes. Some of them seem willing to fight for you ; but no matter. Fight you then, exclusively, to save the Union. I issued the proclamation on purpose to aid you in saving the Union. Whenever you shall have conquered all resistance to the Union, if I shall urge you to continue fighting it will be an apt time then for you to declare you will not fight to free negroes. I thought that in your struggle for the Union, to whatever extent the negroes should cease helping the enemy, to that extent it weakened the enemy in his resistance to you. Do you think differently ? I thought whatever negroes can be got to do as soldiers, leaves just so much less for white soldiers to do in saving the Union. Does it appear otherwise to you ? But negroes, like other people, act upon motives. Why should they do anything for us if we will do nothing for them ? If they stake their lives for us, they must be prompted by the strongest motives, even the promise of freedom. And the promise, being made, must be kept.

"The signs look better. The Father of Waters again goes unvexed to the sea. Thanks to the great Northwest for it ; nor yet wholly to them. Three hundred miles up they met New England, Empire, Keystone, and Jersey, hewing their way right and left. The Sunny South, too, in more colors than one, also lent a helping hand. On the spot, their part of the history was jotted down in black and white. The job was a great national one, and let none be slighted who bore an honorable part in it. And while those who have cleared the great river may well be proud, even that is not all. It is hard to say that anything has been more bravely and well done than at Antietam, Murfreesboro, Gettysburg, and on many fields of less note. Nor must Uncle Sam's web feet be forgotten. At all the watery margins they have been present, not only on the deep sea, the broad bay, and the rapid river, but also up the narrow, muddy bayou, and wherever the ground was a little damp they have been and made their tracks. Thanks to all. For the Republic—for the principle it lives by and keeps alive—for man's vast future—thanks to all.

"Peace does not appear so distant as it did. I hope it will come soon and come to stay ; and so come as to be worth the keeping in all future time. It will then have been proved that among freemen there can be no successful appeal from the ballot to the bullet, and that they who take such an appeal are sure to lose their case and pay the cost. There will be some black men who can remember that with silent tongue and clenched teeth, and steady eye, and well poised bayonet, they have helped mankind on to this great consummation, while I fear there will be some white ones unable to forget that with malignant heart and deceitful speech they have striven to hinder it.

"Still let us not be over sanguine of a speedy, final triumph. Let us be quite sober. Let us diligently apply the means, never doubting that a just GOD, in his own good time, will give us the rightful result."

THE NEW NATIONAL LIFE.

Judging from the experience of past ages it would be unreasonable to expect that a new nation could be organized so complete and perfect in all its parts as to become populous and powerful without experiencing the necessity of constitutional changes in the course of its development. The framers of the Constitution of the United States may have been endowed with even greater wisdom than statesmen who lived before them. Yet their work was not perfect. One element alone in the Constitution—the recognition of chattel property in human beings, early in the national development, divided the popular sentiment and placed the slave and free States in an antagonistical attitude. Although there was a decided difference of opinion held by the framers of the Constitution on the subject, it may be claimed that each individual was actuated by a conscientious desire to dispose of the question of slavery so as to promote the best interests of the whole country. At all events the slave interest found friends and opponents North and South.

In 1790 there were 697,681 slaves in the United States, distributed by States as follows :

SOUTH.	NORTH.
Delaware..... 8,887	New Hampshire. 158
Maryland.....103,036	Rhode Island..... 948
Virginia.....292,627	Connecticut..... 2,764
Tennessee..... 3,417	New York21,324
N. Carolina...100,572	New Jersey.....11,423
S. Carolina...107,094	Pennsylvania..... 3,737
Kentucky.....12,430
Georgia.....29,264
Total South..657,327	Total North..... 40,854

But before this time it had become a settled conviction in the minds of many thinking men that slavery was morally wrong, and on September 5, 1774, the first general Congress assembled at Philadelphia, proclaimed the following as one of its “articles of association:”

“That we will neither import nor purchase any slave imported after the first day of December next ; after which time we will wholly discontinue the slave trade, and will neither be concerned in it ourselves, nor will we hire our vessels, nor sell our commodities or manufactures to those who are concerned in it.”

From that period slavery continued to grow more and more unpopular in the Northern States, while it was pretty generally accepted South as a permanent institution. The Southern influence secured the insertion of a clause in the Constitution providing that the importation of slaves should not be prohibited by Congress prior to 1808. During the intervening period the importation of slaves was stimulated and largely increased—the census of 1810 showing a slave population amounting to 1,191,362 souls. It is more than probable that both sections were governed to some extent in their sentiments on the subject by pecuniary considerations ; but experience had proved that slave labor was less profitable in a cold than in a warm climate. Under this feeling, strengthened by a sense of moral obligation, Massachusetts had already taken the lead in abolishing slavery in that State. In 1780, Pennsylvania passed an act providing for gradual emancipation. Connecticut, Rhode Island, and New Hampshire followed. New York and New Jersey prohibited the further importation of slaves, and even at that time general emancipation had many enthusiastic friends in all the States North of and including Virginia, among whom were some of their most prominent and distinguished citizens. Maryland had also passed a law providing against the further importation of slaves, and a bill of a similar nature was prepared and presented, but after a lively debate was lost in the Virginia legislature.

From 1790 the advocacy of the system became more and more sectional. The popular voice in the North condemned the system, and under local laws it gradually disappeared from all the Northern States. At the same time its permanence in the South became a popular and settled policy, and the aggregate slave population continued to increase until in 1860 it numbered 3,953,760 souls.

But long ere this period the slave had become the innocent cause of an intermosity between the slave-holding and non-slaveholding sections of the Union. The more Northern men said and wrote against the institution, the more firmly were the slaves held by their owners. On the one side the traffic in human chattels was claimed to be in violation of the principles and spirit of Christianity, morals, and humanity; on the other, it was accepted as of divine origin and in accordance with revelation and scripture precept.

Holding these views and claiming a constitutional warrant for the movement, the Southern delegations in Congress, including eighteen members returned under the three-fifths basis of slave population, persistently demanded that the institution should be extended to new Territories and States.

At this juncture, after an experience of years in labored and exciting debate in the national councils, for and against the demand thus made, the slave interest was confronted by a popular uprising on the part of the people, which brought the Republican party into existence, elected Abraham Lincoln, and took the control of the government out of their hands.

The next movement on the part of the slave interest was secession, with the view of building up a Southern empire with slavery for its basis. This resulted in a protracted war, a signal defeat of the slave interest, emancipation of the four million of slaves, and the restoration of the seceded States to the Union.

A general amnesty followed, and the restored States entered upon a new era in their political experience and social relations in the Union. They had the best wishes of every other section of the Union for their unlimited prosperity and future welfare. Not only was this the popular feeling among the people from Maine to Oregon, but the Government displayed a magnanimity and a generosity toward the conquered States never before manifested under similar circumstances; and through Congress and the Executive, everything consistent with the Constitution was done to help the disabled States to enter upon a career of prosperity commensurate with that of the other sections of the Union. This much at least will be admitted by every intelligent and unprejudiced citizen; and there are few to claim that the Government could have done more than was actually attempted on its part toward the recuperation of the disaffected States. Yet neither the sympathies of the people nor the magnanimity of the Government were appreciated or recognized by the South, except in individual cases, and reconstruction and recuperation were unnecessarily impeded and delayed.

But time often secures results that cannot otherwise be obtained. And now, in the closing year of an entire decade, our Southern neighbors are affording gratifying indications of returning reason, by manifesting a conciliatory spirit and an effort to harmonize the sections. There is not that evidence afforded yet that this feeling is general; but of the fact that it is the sincere wish of an undefined portion of the better thinking classes in the communities of the South, there is no just reason to doubt. The heaven is at work, and, if genuine, it will in time do its work, and do it well. The transition may be slow, but it will be successful. Of this there need be no doubt. The stumbling block of the past ten years was idleness. This is one of the worst of all mischief-makers. The planters did little or nothing but worry over the "lost cause;" the poor whites preferred bar-room politics to active industry; the blacks, in their transition state, were jostled between politicians and planters, with little encouragement to toil, and without prospect of fair remuneration for labor from either party when performed. Now, the planter is giving more attention to his fields, while necessity is forcing the poorer class of whites into better habits of industry, and colored labor generally finds employment and remuneration.

We have reliable accounts that the transition from depression to general prosperity is going on more rapidly now than at any former period since the close of the war. The farms are better cultivated, and consequently give a larger return for labor than they did in former years. The reports for the present year show that while the great staple, cotton, is not neglected, but will yield more than an average crop, the area devoted to cereals and vegetables has been largely increased. Wheat and oats are harvested, and the first installments of new wheat-flour are already (Aug. 3) in the market in advance of north-western competition.

In manufactures commendable progress is manifested. There are nearly 200 cotton factories in the South, competing successfully with those in the North. In fact, so far as returns of earnings have been obtained, the figures show conclusively that the mills in the South are making larger profits than those in the North. In New England the Chicope Mills, with a capital of $430,000, made an average of 25.6 per cent. during the period from 1862 to 1871. The Salem Mills, with a capital of $2,000,000, made a profit of 22.5 per cent.; the Pacific, capital $2,500,000, made 21.25 per cent.; the Naumkeag, capital $1,500,000, made 19.62 per cent.; the Merrimac, capital $2,500,000, made 15.5 per cent.; and the Middlesex, capital $750,000, made 12.5 per cent. These profits, leaving out of the calculation the capital invested, show an average percentage of 17.98.

In the South the Macon, Georgia, cotton mills report their profits at an average of 35 per cent. per annum for the last two years. The annual profits of the Petersburg, Va., mills are reported at 25 per cent.; the Langley, S. C., mills, over 25 per cent.; the Augusta, Ga., mills, 20 per cent.; the Columbus, S. C., mills, (3,000 spindles and 900 looms,) 20 per cent., as shown by the furnished report of the President; and the Tallahassee, Florida, mills, 20 per cent. are the annual profits for the last, and in cases the full average per annum for the last two years. These six leading mills average 24 per cent. profit per annum, while the average profits of the six Northern mills for a period of ten years—1862 to 1871, were 17.98 per cent., showing the profits of Southern mills to be over 6 per cent. more than those in the North. It is not claimed, however, that these figures are absolutely correct in every case, nor can they be accepted as showing the exact average profits of all the cotton-mills North and South; yet, they are approximately correct, and show conclusively that the profits on cotton manufactures are significantly larger in the South than they are in the North.

In view of the fact that the North has the advantage of better educated labor than the South, it would naturally be supposed that the larger profits would be with the greater intelligence. But this advantage seems to be more than balanced by others favoring Southern manufacturers. In the South wages are comparatively low. Again, they have the cotton at their doors, while transportation to Lowell costs $5 per bale; commissions, $1.50; insurance, 50 cents; exchange, shipping and truckage, 65 cents; total, $7.65. A bale of 450 pounds, at 15 cents, is $67.50, on which expenses of transportation, etc., is 11 per cent. Add the loss by waste in shipping, transportation, reshipping, etc., which is always calculated at 15 per cent., and this increases the disadvantage of the Northern manufacturer, as against his Southern competitor, to 13.33 per cent.

This, with the diminished cost of labor in the cotton growing regions, secures to the South advantages that cannot fail to stimulate the manufacturing industries of that section. In fact, there appears to be nothing to prevent the South from taking the lead in this important branch of our manufactures. Millions of dollars are annually invested and employed in the production of cotton fabrics and mixed goods, in their large and increasing varieties, and no section of the Union promises so large returns for these investments as the South.

But the renewed energies of the South are not confined in their application to cotton manufactures. Woolens and mixed wool and cotton fabrics for women's wear; boots and shoes, clothing and furniture are embraced in the programme of new industries, while mining and iron and coal products are receiving more attention than ever before, as are also the articles of lumber, naval stores, and oil cake from cotton-seed.

Such are some of the elements in the transition of these States, and the abandonment of slave for free labor. Others will follow, as a matter of course. What are the grand results of this? The factory attracts population, and affords employment to male and female hands. New villages spring up; villages grow into towns, and towns into cities. An extended market is afforded for agricultural products. Vegetables, fruits and other articles, that will not bear transportation to a distance, find ready markets at home, and are converted into cash at fair prices, or exchanged for cloths, women's wear, boots, shoes and clothing for family use. Thus the factory and the farm help each other; the industries of the neighborhood are enlarged and stimulated, and the material prosperity and wealth of the State are increased.

Better than all else, a lively competition between North and South will obliterate the last vestiges of sectional animosity and substitute a spirit of honorable rivalry in manufactures and general development. In fact it may safely be predicted that the day is not distant when the people North and South, will look back upon these transition years as the period which inaugurated the NEW NATIONAL LIFE, with the fundamental elements of discord removed; with the people on the broad basis of universal free popular education, and pledged to common effort for national development and material prosperity.

The nation occupies a more exalted to-day than ever before; and every removed forever, with the harmoniously united, with more cultivation and more factories than ever before, with a fair field and a vast inter-States commerce free trade, reaching from Ocean and commence its second century paces that may well command the and elicit the congratulations of

REVIEW OF THE MONTH.

NATIONAL.

...The death of Andrew Johnson, the progress of the Centennial Exposition, with the reported declination of several important foreign governments to participate, and the controversy now raging over the management of Indian affairs, are the only events of interest sufficient to be grouped under this head.

...In the comments on the life and character of the ex-President, with which the press is still teeming, a notable illustration is presented of the inadequacy of post-mortem eulogies.

Fortunately thinking persons do not expect to find in them any really critical review of a man's career. They are, therefore, not disappointed, even when they are so insufficient as in this instance. But the superficial readers and busy persons, who are glad or are compelled, perhaps, to take opinions at second-hand, will be misled by much of what has been uttered over Andrew Johnson. That as a private personage, he was honest in business matters, kindly in dealings with his fellows, sagacious in intellect, dogmatic and self-opinionated to a degree almost insufferable among any class, but those who were his inferiors, there can be no doubt; nor that in public affairs he was personally ambitious, a daring politician with an intensely combative individuality which often stood in the light of conscience and judgment both, and led him to positions that if he could have understood and used the forces opposing him with any practical tact, might have marked him in history as both heroic and dangerous; that his life was a romance—one of those careers which refute the theory that there is no place for exceptional character and personality in a Democracy—no one will deny. His career at the outbreak of the rebellion, is deserving of unqualified commendation. The speeches which he delivered in the Senate in the winter of 1860-61, were not merely words ably arrayed to set forth his purpose and argument. Coming as they did from a man of acknowledged pro-slavery views, they were like the marshalling of armed battalions—like an outbreak in the enemy's line of battle. They gave courage to the faint-hearted and were a beacon light to those who were beset in the South itself. Mr. Johnson represented, as no other public man has ever done, the virtues and faults of the class from which he sprung—the poor and non-slaveholding whites. He was a man of "moods and tenses," and in the wonderful weeks of that dreary winter, and more startling months that followed, he was at the height of his most superlative mood. There can be no doubt, even though some of the earnestness he displayed was the result of his personal antagonism to a personal and class insolence that had often been levelled at himself, by men like Davis and Tombs, that his devotion to the integrity of the Union was unquestionable, and that he gave, at the period named, the highest service with all the vigor of a powerful character. Yet, those events do not give a complete idea of Mr. Johnson's public character during the memorable period in which he was so prominent an actor.

After all, however, returning to the value of the average post mortem criticisms of a public man, what light is shed by most of the sketches and articles that have been written during the past month, on the real character of Mr. Johnson? How much do they teach us of the conditions which created this man, or of the purposes which animated him, or the passions which dominated and surrounded his daily walk and acts, in the memorable eight years in which both were of marked importance to the American people and to general history? We believe him personally honest. What was it, however, in his character that surrounded him with corrupt and venial hangers-on? What was it, we add—if Mr. Johnson's patriotism was so broad and national in character; so free from personal bearing, as is claimed—that made it so sectional in results; so intensely personal in character—and so seemingly revolutionary in spirit and purpose? There have been periods of great political excitement in the brief history of this Republic. The fury of foreign war has been forgotten in tempest-nous shocks of civil strife. Power has been rudely used, as in Jackson's day, and again abused as in the Presidencies of Pierce and Buchanan. The Nation gathered itself almost in bewilderment at its own wonderful vigor, when under Abraham Lincoln it marshalled to suppress sectional rebellion. But never did we appear, as a people, so near an intestine struggle, as during the incumbency of Andrew Johnson. Yet the critical historian, calmly analyzing the records, will see in after years that to him and his obstinate self-sufficiency, inordinate belief in his own views, and those of his section, rather than to patriotic respect for the whole country, was due the larger portion of the disturbing influences which so nearly plunged the Republic into another and more desolating civil strife, threatening even a division of States and not one by sections only. The time has not yet arrived for a clear and calm judgment of Andrew Johnson's career—its power, as well as limitations. He seems to us to have been a man of more daring purpose; of more directly ambitious intents in the carrying them forward, than the current judgment at this writing accords. The contest which animated his administration was one of deeper historical significance than that at which it is now estimated. It was a repetition, under new conditions, of the old, old struggle, between parliamentary or representative government, and that of government by the person or the executive. It was an impinging of the days of Charles the First and the English Parliament. At times it seemed as if Mr. Johnson would have liked to have masqueraded as the Southern Cromwell—to have brought the seventeenth century into the nineteenth, but he never comprehended the North, or the conservative, right-restraining forces, that evolve from free institutions. Of these he practically knew nothing. Here was his weakness and his strength also. He lived out positively the only life he knew, and was destroyed by it. We repeat, the time has not come to pass a final judgment on Andrew Johnson. Perhaps occasion may offer to draw the vail from some of the interior dangers which threatened. If so, it will be seen that this powerful politician was chiefly restrained from a renewal of civil war, and baffled in his daring designs by the untiring vigilance of a few clear-sighted citizens who knew whither those designs led and took measures to thwart them. Their acts, unknown to this day by the general public, combined with the intelligent opinion of the loyal masses, stirring to active resistance a Congress somewhat weak and vacillating at the beginning, temporizing during the progress of the conflict, but growing in spirit and vigor as the people were heard and the dangers became more clearly apparent, were the means by which it was averted.

...The declination of Russia and Italy to participate as governments in the Universal Exposition at Philadelphia, by which we propose to celebrate our Centennial, is a disappointment to the management and the American people both. So far as Russia is concerned, it is her loss, not ours. Italy will probably present, through individual exertions, a fair exhibit. It is her poverty and not her will, that prevents the government, as such, from putting in an appearance. Without any disrespect to the Italian Sovereign it might be suggested that a reduction of a lavish civil list would doubtless afford the means for the exposition itself, as well as lighten the burdens of a heavily taxed people, whose annual expenditures are nearly $300,000,000. For Russia, however, the difficulty is worthy of notice. The Czar cannot understand how this Government could commit such a diplomatic faux pas as that of inviting him—the ruler of eighty odd million people—to join in an enterprise conducted by plain American citizens. This involves quite plainly the whole difference between a coercive and a co-operative form of government. The Czar Alexander, commands; the American Congress assists. This is a distinction with a difference. It is, however, to be regretted that our ally and friend will not be with us at Philadelphia. Mr. John Jay, ex-minister resident to Austria, to whose desire to prove how much, or how little he knows about expositions universelle, we owe the bringing out of the fact that Russia would not accept our invitation, might, however, refrain from offering his advice gratis, which, as the elder Sheridan once said abo a doctor's sign to the same effect, is "forty per cent above its value." Whether he was right or not in the early stages of the disgraceful imbroglio of 1873, his management of that and all other matters connected with American interests at the Vienna Exposition, was such as could only result in winning for him the hearty dislike of all his compatriots who had the misfortune to be there at the time.

...The Sioux Indian investigation is still in progress. We shall know, ere long, actual facts. The country will accept the report to be made by the able gentlemen, who compose the commission. Spotted Tail, the Brulé Chief, is again demonstrating his shrewdness as a diplomat. Learning by the eagerness of the whites to enter the Black Hills, something of the value they are likely to place on it, he is actively engaged in enhancing the claims of his people, in order to obtain a larger price. If the press dispatches are reliable—and that is a large "if"—he has given another proof of his own capacity at least, to cope with his white neighbors, by addressing a miner's meeting and notifying them and the country generally, of the Brulé way of establishing their side of a discussion and bargain.

...The contest in the Cherokee Nation, about which so many contradictory reports have been received, has probably ended in the re-election of the present chief, Wm. P. Ross, as well as the return of a large majority of his party friends to the Cherokee Senate. This result, almost wholly unexpected by those, who, at a distance, gained their information from telegraphic dispatches, must teach caution in making a definitive judgment on affairs in the Indian Territory. Ouncelletta, (Charles Thomson) the opposing candidate, is a full-blooded Cherokee, a Baptist minister of some natural ability and acquired knowledge. He was a private soldier in one of the U. S. Indian Volunteer regiments, raised during the civil war. Downing, whose name was used for a party cry, was the Lieutenant-Colonel of that regiment. He is a full-blood; who died some time ago. His son is a man of no force. The dividing the Cherokees are no longer those of the Ross and Ridge factions—though the latter, who were mostly rebels, have since the war closed and they were permitted to return, joined the full-bloods, who, under the leadership of a well-known Baptist missionary, Rev. Mr. Jones, and his son, long domiciled among the Cherokees, have from 1866, led a party against the Ross family and their friends. The younger Jones desired to secure the chieftainship and failing that, Ouncelletta was put forward. Colonel Boudinot, who is so often named in these matters, is a man of fine talents, formerly regarded as the "hereditary" leader of the Ridge party—exiles for nearly thirty years from the Cherokee country. He was the Indian Delegate to the rebel Congress, having before that been Secretary of the Arkansas Secession Convention. He is now the advocate of the "Railroad" policy, as it is called by those who oppose it, of sectionalizing the Territory and abolishing the tribal life. The Grand Council of the Indian tribes and communities settled in the "Territory of Oklahoma," provided for by the treaty of 1866, holds an adjourned session during the present month. Their last meeting was in May, and the following tribes and bands, with the enumerated membership, were present by delegates:

(Tribal Census 1872.)

Cherokees,	18,000
Choctaws and Chickasaws,	22,000
Creeks,	12,295
Seminoles,	2,398
Senecas, Shawnees and Quapaws,	544
Ottawas (150) Peorias (160) and Wyandotts (222),	532
Pottawatomies,	1,600
Absentee Shawnee,	663
Sacs and Foxes,	463
Osages,	3,956
Wichitas and seven affiliated bands,	1,250
Modocs,	50
Comanches, Cheyennes and Arapahoes, ..	6,786
Total, ..	70,537.

The discussion showed that the leading Indians are now united on the idea of a general territorial Government over all the tribes, with a Legislature of two houses, a Governor of their own selection, a judiciary organized after the model furnished by the States of the Union, and the right to send a Delegate who shall have a seat on the floor of Congress at Washington, to look after their interests. The Constitution or form of Government, which has been drafted, is to be discussed at the session, which convenes on the first of September.

....The Republicans of Minnesota have placed an excellent ticket in the field. The nominations are :

Governor, John S. Pillsbury; Lieutenant-Governor, James B. Weakfield; Secretary of State, John S. Irgens; State Auditor, O. P. Whitcomb, present incumbent; State Treasurer, Wm. Pfaender; Attorney General, Geo. P. Wilson, present incumbent; Clerk of the Supreme Court, Samuel H. Nichols; Railroad Commissioner, Chas. A. Gilman.

No nomination was made for Chief Justice (vacant by reason of Senator McMillan's election) upon the reason given in the following resolution :

Resolved, That, believing it a duty to elevate the choice of Judges above whatever is debasing in party contests, this convention will make no formal nomination for Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, but, in recognition of the unanimous voice of the legal profession of the State, as well as the general judgment of men of all classes, which has found expression in executive appointments, we commend for election to that office the present incumbent, Judge James Gilfillan, a man pre-eminently qualified for the high position.

The following is the platform adopted :

1. The Republicans of Minnesota reaffirm the cardinal principles of their party, which have become the established policy of both State and national governments: The unity and indissolubility of the nation, and the equal rights and just protection of all men before the law.

2. That on the prominent questions of the day we favor that policy of finance which shall steadily keep in view a return to specie payments.

3. A tariff strictly for revenue, yet so adjusted as to be least burdensome and most favorable to the interests of home industry and labor.

4. We demand that all railway and other corporations shall be held in fair and just subjection to the law-making power, constitutionally exercised.

5. That we cordially indorse the progressive and liberal policy of the Republican party, in its well defined and clearly announced purpose to foster the agricultural, industrial, and commercial interests of the country by a judicious system of internal improvements, having for their object the enlargement of facilities and reduction in cost of transportation for inter-State commerce.

6. That to the Republican party is justly due the honor and credit of securing, for the first time, recognition by foreign governments of full and complete rights of citizenship, in reversal of the monarchical doctrine that a subject cannot absolve himself from allegiance to his sovereign by naturalization under our laws.

7. Commends the State government and points to the reduction of taxes.

8. That the example of Washington in refusing to be a candidate for a third Presidential term, and the affirmance of President Grant of that principle, is one we sacredly cherish, and we should regard a departure from it a dangerous innovation.

9. That we approve of the present Republican National Administration, and especially the earnest efforts to collect the revenue, to prevent and punish fraud, to expose past violations, and to guard against their recurrence in the future.

10. That we indorse the policy of adjusting difficulties between this and foreign nations by arbitration instead of war, and, as friends of justice, peace, and humanity, we shall hail the day when this policy shall be adopted throughout the world.

11. A grateful people can never forget the services of her soldiers, and it is due to them that liberality and generosity should be exercised in matters of back-pay, bounties, and pensions.

12. That since the purity and permanency of free institutions of government depend upon the universal diffusion of knowledge and virtue among the people, the Republican party of Minnesota reaffirms its conviction that it is the duty of the State, not only to maintain the integrity of the common school system, but to do all that is needful so as to increase its efficiency so as to secure the blessings of wise and generous education to every child within its borders.

It seems to be conceded that the ticket will be elected by a considerable majority.

...The Republican State Convention of Oregon, assembled on the 11th ult. An "independent" convention met at Salem, the capitol, on the preceding day. The principal business was to make a nomination for Congress in place of George A. La Dow, deceased. There are three candidates: Republican, Henry Warner; Democrat, Lafayette Lane, (son of General Joe Lane;) Independent, G. M. Whitney. Mr. La Dow was elected by only 302 plurality. The Independent so called, has decreased and the Temperance vote will be given for Mr. Warner. The vote last year was, Republican 9,340; Democrat 9,642; Independent 6,350. The prospects are favorable.

...The Maryland Democrats held a stormy State Convention, and nominated John Lee Carroll, as Governor; Levin Woolford, Comptroller, and C. J. M. Gwynn, Attorney General. These nominations are denounced by Maryland Democrats, outside of Baltimore, as being made by dictation of a corrupt ring, formed by an alliance with the Catholic prelacy and priesthood, and Democratic managers, who are making riches out of politics. Their platform reads in the main like good Republican doctrine. The first resolve quotes from Thomas Jefferson's statement of a party's true purposes:

"Equal and exact justice to all men of whatever State or persuasion, religious, or political; the support of the State governments in all their rights as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies; the preservation of the general Government in its whole constitutional vigor as the sheet-anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad; the supremacy of the civil over the military authority; economy in the public expenses, that labor may be lightly burdened; the honest payment of our debts and the sacred preservation of the public faith; the diffusion of information and the arraignment of the bar of public reason, freedom; freedom of the press; freedom under the protection of laws and trial by jury impartially being to oppose in these opinions, as we have long since enforced,ocracy departed from. They then t a high protective tariff, want-r revenue; against the multiplir-al offices and the abuses of its rich tend to dwarf the States pt free institutions: Demand are, manufactures and com-and capital, should be the equal all-regulated governments:—nst any increase of the circuy, and favors specie resump-earliest possible moment:—ad subsidies or other monopoth resolution treats of State affairs, the public schools and the good order prevailing. The last commends the nominees and party.

.. The Mississippi Democracy have been compelled to yield, in appearance, at least, to the public denunciation of the "color line" barbarism. At their State Convention, August 5, they did so, protesting of the Republican party, "you're another," and shouting, "It's not me, but that other fellow, Uncle Sam, who did the naughty thing." To the clearest-minded man in Southern Democratic ranks, Colonel Lamar, is due the sagacity which avoids the appearance of this atrocity. Like their Maryland friends, they are content to steal the livery of Heaven wherein to serve the other place. Their platform abounds with "glittering generalities." They first christen themselves as the "Democratic and Conservative party," invoke God's blessing and invite the co-operation of all who favor an honest and economical administration; they declare that they recognize, and will maintain the civil and political equality of all men, as established by the Constitution and its amendments; favor the education of all children in public schools; the election of honest men to office; economy in public affairs; biennial legislative sessions; an impartial judiciary; discountenance special legislation; ask encouragement of agriculture by relief from burdensome taxation; encouragement of manufactures; a more elevated standard of official life; the rebuilding of the river levees by aid of the general Government;—these are followed by denunciations of the State Republican administration, and the following resolve, heralded as an anti-color line declaration:

"That we cordially invite the voters of all the people of both races, to unite vigorously with us in the approaching canvass in a determined effort to give success to the foregoing principles, and thus to secure to ourselves and our posterity, the blessings of an honest, economical government, administered by able, efficient and competent public officers."

W. L. Hemingway was nominated for State Treasurer. L. Q. C. Lamar, W. T. Martin and O. R. Singleton, all ex-Confederate soldiers, are in the field for Congress. These brave collections of words are an evidence to the Republican voters and others loyal to the National idea, to be careful of the men and their antecedents, for whom they vote.

OTHER CONVENTIONS.

The "convention of colored editors," held at Cincinnati, O., on the 5th ult., was assembled under the advice of Governor Pinchback, Louisiana, Frederick Douglass, Sr., Prof. Langston and others. Its attendance was considerable and its deliberations important.

The delegates and newspapers represented were: G. C. Jackson, American Citizen, Lexington, Ky.; E. D. Shaw, Planet, Tennessee; L. H. Douglass, Elevator, San Francisco, Cal.; P. B. S. Pinchback and S. T. Ruby, of Louisiana; G. Sella Martin, Republican, Concordia, La.; J. H. Burch, Grand Era, Baton Rouge, La.; Wm. M. Gibbs, Pacific Appeal; P. H. Clark, Spectator, Galveston; David Young, Concordia Eagle, Louisiana; B. W. Arnett and H. W. Turner, Christian Recorder, Philadelphia, Pa.; W. H. Parham, National Monitor, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Chas. Bell, Colored Citizen; T. M. Chester, Progressive American, New York; and W. G. Brown, Terre Bonne, La. Peter H. Clark, of Cincinnati, was selected as President. It had been proposed to change the conference into a convention, but under the advice of a letter, signed by Frederick Douglass, J. A. Emerson, and J. G. Barbadoes, and after earnest debate, it was resolved to call a national convention, to be held at Nashville, on the first Wednesday in April, 1876. Three delegates from each State, and one additional for every twenty-five thousand colored population and fractional part thereof, and one from each Territory, excepting the District of Columbia, which shall have four, are to be elected. A Press Association was formed, as also a Centennial Committee charged with the preparation of a volume, which shall give the origin of the negro, ancient history of the race, its introduction to the New World, and the negroes position for the century past, in battle, marine, school house, pulpit, platform, professions, press, business and labor, in literature and politics, and sketches of the negro martyrs.

EDUCATION.

...The annual meeting of the National Educational Association was held at Minneapolis, Minnesota. Papers were read by or from D.C. Gilman, President John Hopkins University, Baltimore, Md.; J. B. Angell, President University of Michigan; John Eaton, Jr., National Commissioner of Education, Washington, D. C.; Duane Doty, Superintendent Public Schools, Detroit, Michigan; A. P. Marble, Superintendent Public Schools, Worcester, Mass.; Leon Trousdale, State Superintendent Public Instruction, Nashville, Tenn.; W. F. Phelps, President State Normal School, Winona, Minn.; Dr. J. W. Hoyt, Madison, Wis.; Miss Grace C. Bibb, City Normal School, at St. Louis, Mo.; William W. Folwell, President State University, Minneapolis, Minn.; Lewis Felmeri, Professor of Pedagogics at the University of Klausenberg, Austria; H. A. M. Henderson, Superintendent Public Instruction, Frankfort, Ky.; J. B. Merwin, editor American Journal of Education, St. Louis, Mo.; Henry Kiddle, Superintendent Public Schools, New York City. The subjects of agriculture and polytechnic instruction, country schools, health in the school-room, school record-books, course of study in high schools and colleges, German pedagogy, education in the Southern States, Centennial Anniversary, caste in education, State school laws, art in education, co-ordination of schools with the State, etc., were among the principal topics discussed. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President—W. T. Phelps, of Minnesota. Secretary—W. D. Hinkle, of Ohio. Treasurer—A. P. Marble, of Massachusetts.

COTTON—STATE RAILROAD CONTROL—REVENUE AND FINANCE.

...The Cotton Exchange Convention met at Greenbriar, White Sulphur Springs, W. Va. since the last review. The President was John Phelps, of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange. Delegates were present from Mobile, Charleston, Savannah, New Orleans, Baltimore, Boston, Memphis, Selma, Montgomery, Charlotte, St. Louis, Nashville, Augusta, Athens, Ga., Galveston and Louisville, and the Convention numbered about one hundred persons. The discussions related to the simplification of cotton exchange, forwarding, packing and transportation, though the Southern members had an eye to politics as usual, by inviting "Bob" Toombs to participate in their proceedings.

...A notable meeting, or Convention, was held July 20, at Springfield, Illinois. Railroad commissioners were present from four or five States. The object was to compare the laws of the several States on railroad supervision and discuss the different policies pursued.

...A national meeting of greenback theorists, under the designation of "Industrial Convention," was called for the 18th of August, by a committee, appointed, their call stated, for this purpose, at the annual session of the Industrial Convention of Virginia and North Carolina, held at Petersburg, Va., in November, 1874. The call proposed to inquire why "the national wealth is rapidly increasing, and the producers of that wealth are growing poorer." They, therefore, ask for the election of delegates without regard to existing parties.

...The colored citizens of Virginia met by delegates in Convention at Richmond, on the 19th of August, to consider their condition in that State.

...What is known as the "National Greenback Convention"—no connection with the Indianapolis affair—met at Detroit on the 25th ult.

CONVENTIONS CALLED.

...Wednesday, September 1.—Reunion of all former Union and Confederate Soldiers in Caldwell, Ohio, to continue three days.

Wednesday, September 8.—Pennsylvania Democratic State Convention at Erie.

Wednesday, September 8.—Wisconsin Democratic State Convention, at Milwaukee.

Wednesday, September 8.—Maryland Republican State Convention, at Westminster.

Wednesday, September 15.—Nebraska Republican State Convention, at Kearney, to nominate three candidates for justices of the supreme court, and six candidates for regents of the University of Nebraska, to be voted for at the general election to be held in accordance with the provisions of the proposed new Constitution, on the second Monday of October next.

Wednesday, September 15.—State Labor Reform Convention of Massachusetts. The practical nullification of the ten hour law is the chief point of appeal.

October 25.—Convention to discuss the internal revenue reform, and in favor of specie resumption. The movement originated with a number of gentlemen connected with the tobacco interest, who met in Richmond, Virginia, last May.

...At a recent meeting of business men held in New York, the following twenty-five delegates were appointed to attend the Cincinnati Convention, and a series of hard-money resolutions were adopted:

Messrs. F. K. Thurber, Lloyd Aspinwall, S. D. Babcock, A. L. Earle, George W. Clarke, Fred A. Conkling, George W. Sistar, Parker Hardy, D. H. Landon, C. M. Fry, Algernon S. Sullivan, A. A. Low, Wm. H. Wiley, G. A. Merwin, Thos W. Evans, Percy Pyne, John F. Henry, Wm. R. Kirkland, Charles A. Dana, Franklin Eason Myer, H. Myer, Clarkson N. Potter, John F. Agnew, C. Delamater, and J. W. Seligman.

This is a very strong business delegation, and the following, with other resolutions, was adopted:

"That we inflexibly set our faces against all schemes for currency inflation, or any form of paper currency, 'greenbacks,' or otherwise, so long as that currency shall consist of irredeemable promises to pay money; and we will not approve any policy which has not a direct purpose to establish the currency on a par with and actually interconvertible with coin."

KENTUCKY POLITICS.—In 1871, the Democrats carried the City of Louisville, Ky., by 4,663 majority. This year they carried it by only 2,783 majority. The vote was the largest ever cast in the city, at a State election. The result indicates a Republican growth. If the Republican party continues to put good men in nomination, the time is not far distant when the citizens of Kentucky will recognize in it the only political party that can add to their wealth, and develop the wonderful resources of the State.

WHEN the Republican party went out of power in Texas, some three years ago, it turned over to Democracy 2,067 public schools, with 5,625 teachers and 127,672 pupils. What has been the result? To-day, there is but 562 public schools in the State, with a corresponding reduction in the number of teachers and pupils. Yet the Democratic party pretends to believe in popular education.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONS: By Franklin B. Hough. In two volumes, octavo. Albany: Weed, Parsons & Co., 1872.

These bulky and handsomely printed volumes are indispensable to the library of every editor, student, politician, and professional man. In fact, it would seem that any private library, at all formed for use in the study of public affairs, is incomplete without them. They contain correct copies of the State Constitutions in existence at the time of publication. The changes that have been made since 1872, in New York, Nebraska, Arkansas, Michigan, and Missouri, or are pending in Alabama and Texas, can readily be ascertained and compared. The Constitution of the United States, with an historical sketch of the preceding Confederacy and the facts relating to its formation, are given with clearness and precision. In an appendix of historical value, the Confederate Constitution is given, and the new Constitution of West Virginia (1872) is added. Each State Constitution is prefaced by a brief but inclusive historical sketch, relative to the early history of the State and the steps by which the Constitution was framed and admission or adhesion to the Union obtained and secured. An admirable map showing in a lucid manner the acquisitions of territory, the differing boundaries of the United States and the several States at various periods, accompany the work, and finely lithographed fac-similes of the seals of the Union and the several States are given. One of the most valuable portions of the work is a classified analysis of the Constitutions, according to subjects, thus "showing by comparative arrangement, every Constitutional provision" in force at the date of publication. A table of reference to judicial decisions is added. The editing of this valuable work is admirably done. As it can readily be kept level with the changes that are made from time to time, it must continue to remain a standard work. The price of the work, $7.50 per vol., is very reasonable, taking in view the great labor and cost necessarily expended. Dr. Hough would confer a great favor on the public by the preparation of a companion volume, giving all the former and now defunct Constitutions, from the organization of the several States and Colonies, with the ante-Revolutionary charters of the latter, arranged in such a way as to enable the student and editor to easily compare the operative instruments with them, and thus note the changes made in the organic laws, and the directions which such changes indicate. Such a volume would be a worthy accession to our Centennial literature.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND NATIONAL ECONOMY: By Robt. Ellis Thompson, M. A., Professor of social science in the University of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia: Porter and Coates, 1875.

This compendious and compact text book, as it modestly claims to be, is something more than that. Its review of the different schools of "Political Economy," known as "cosmopolitical" and "national" schools, and its broad and vigorous support of the latter, places Prof. Thompson in the foremost ranks of those who follow Carey and the American and German views. There is one feature and that the fundamental arrangement of the work, which will commend it to the general reader, as well as prove attractive to specialists in the same studies. The preface explains this better than any other words can: "The form of the book is entirely different from the ordinary arrangement under the three rubrics, 'production, distribution, consumption.'" The method pursued of itself excludes "that artificial and symmetrical distribution of its parts," which—the author believes—sacrifices life and reality to the system. The Professor believes that he has shown that social science is not "up in the clouds," but "one that touches on human life and the world's history at all points." The result is not a rehash of that "dismal science" which Carlyle derides and Ruskin scorns, but a vigorous and animated treatise full of interest and the warmth of human effort.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE. By J. A. Green, M. A., Examiner in the School of Modern History, Oxford. With Maps and Tables. New York: Harper & Brother, Publishers, Franklin Square. 1875.

This admirable volume is a marked tribute to the growing influence of the Democratic spirit and philosophy, which recognizes in the movement of the masses—the great underlying elements of social life and historical growth—rather than in the exceptional lives of single and exceptional men—the true law of historical statement and progress. It is in another form the application of Taine's critical law, whereby the great French critic constructs from the æsthetic works—the poetry, painting, sculpture, literature—of any age or nation, the life of the epoch and people out of which they came. In truth this is the application of the Democratic idea to regions from which heretofore it has been largely excluded. Mr. Green admirably states it, when he declares his work "is a history, not of English kings or conquest, but of the English people." He has passed lightly over martial deeds, not caring to make "a drum and trumpet history" of foreign wars and adventures, court, political, and diplomatic intrigues, "to dwell, at length, on the incident of that constitutional, intellectual and social advance in which we read the history of the nation itself." Admirably has this aim been attained, and the work is one that should be in every library.

OUR NEXT DOOR NEIGHBOR.—A winter in Mexico. By Gilbert Haven. With illustrations and maps. Harper and Brothers, 1875.

This admirably printed and illustrated book is a great disappointment. Practically, our "Next Door Neighbor" are the people of whom we know the least, unless it be those American communities to which Mexico lies next door, and we are a little further removed. Bishop Haven's book will not enlighten us, except as to a certain objective life—the out-of-doors on which the traveler looks; the passing glimpses of every-day occurrences that attend his peregrination, and the general incidents sure to come within the range of a wide-eyed man—like the Bishop, we were about to say. That must be qualified, for no one not a bigot can rise from a perusal of this book and not note how the professional tone has narrowed, limited and dwarfed the writer. It is a surprising thing that a man of such talents and experiences as Gilbert Haven, could not get anything more than what almost might be termed "cant" if we did not know him to be so sincere a man—within the lids of such a volume as this.

MAN AND BEAST. Here and hereafter. By Rev. J. G. Wood, M. A. Harpers, 1875.

This is a delightful book, full of charming anecdotes, attractively illustrating the authors theories that animals have reason, intelligence, and probably souls. It is a comforting theory to render, as it dignifies human nature, and teaches a more kindly spirit to our so-called dumb associates, friends and servants.

MACREADY'S REMINISCENCES and selection from his Diary and Letters. Edited by Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart., one of his Executors. Harpers, 1875.

Books relating to the theater and actors are always attractive to the general reader. Especially is this so when they relate to the lives of those who charm and hold on the "mimic stage." This is probably due somewhat to the fact that they seem to live in an atmosphere apart from our own. This volume is one of the most interesting of its class, but whether it will add to the general estimate of Macready's character is another question.

NEW PUBLICATION.

Received from the Secretary, The Bulletin of the Iron and Steel Association, and the valuable Annual Report for 1874. Also the August No. of the American Exchange and Review, a magazine devoted to Finance, Insurance, Transportation and other business interests.

It is a good sign to see the ultra Democratic sheets of the South venting their wrath upon old Confederate leaders, like Forrest and Pillow. It gives us to understand that some representative Southern men are using their influence to advance liberal ideas. When Democracy begins to abuse a man, North or South, we have some hope of that man's future. This is the gentle compliment paid to General Forrest, by the Vindicator, of Nachitoches, Louisiana, for addressing a colored meeting on the Fourth of July as "ladies and gentlemen:"

"Is there not some 'swash bucket' about all that Forrest said above—some lingering, hunting desire for a small piece of the chicken pie? Forrest was a blackguard as a soldier, and as a politician he is worse than a boot lick."

EXECUTIVE AND DEPARTMENT DOINGS.

THE EXECUTIVE.

DEATH OF EX-PRESIDENT ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 31, 1875.

It becomes the painful duty of the President to announce to the people of the United States the death of Andrew Johnson, the last survivor of his honored predecessors, which occurred in Carter county, East Tennessee, at an early hour this morning.

The solemnity of the occasion which called him to the Presidency, with the varied nature and length of his public services, will cause him to be long remembered and occasion mourning for the death of a distinguished public servant.

As a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, it is ordered that the Executive Mansion and several Departments of the Government at Washington be draped in mourning until the close of the day designated for his funeral, and that all public business be suspended on that day.

It is further ordered that the War and Navy Departments cause suitable honors to be paid on the occasion to the memory of the illustrious dead.

U. S. GRANT.

By the President:

JOHN L. CADWALLADER,

Acting Secretary of State.

STATE DEPARTMENT.

INTERNATIONAL COUNTERFEITING SCHEME.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

WASHINGTON, July 21, 1875.

His Honor the Mayor of the City of New York:

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that a note has recently been received from the British Minister at this capital, accompanied by a copy of a communication addressed by the Governor of the Bank of France to the Governor of the Bank of England, in which it is stated that there is an association of counterfeiters, with headquarters at Barcelona, who have already placed a quantity of counterfeit twenty-franc notes in circulation, and likewise counterfeit gold pieces of the value of twenty and twenty-five francs each (Napoleons, Jabelinas, and sovereigns.) The association, it is said, are now preparing to issue, on a gigantic scale, Bank of England notes, and 1,000 franc notes on the Bank of France, which notes, to the amount of 12,000,000, are to be taken to New York, where a single banker is to see to their emission. The notes of the Bank of France are to be put in circulation at London and Frankfort, through the medium of bankers.

The person who made the disclosure says he has seen these notes, and that the paper of the counterfeits is identical with that made by the Bank of England. These facts are communicated to you with the request that you will give the matter such consideration as you may deem proper.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH.

THE VIRGINIUS INDEMNITY.

The amount of the indemnity from Spain, growing out of the capture of the Virginus, has been received by this Government, and is ready for distribution. Claimants to any share therein should address the Department of State.

PASSPORTS FOR TRAVELERS.

American travelers complain of frequent annoyance from officers of foreign governments in consequence of their not being furnished with passports. American citizens about to proceed abroad would, therefore, do well to provide themselves with these safeguards, which, if not procured at the Department of State here, can be obtained at any of the United States legations in foreign countries.

MINISTER BADEAU.

The President has signed the commission of Adam Badeau, to be minister resident at Brussels.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

INTERNAL REVENUE DISTRICTS.

The President has issued an order consolidating the First and Second Internal Revenue districts of Pennsylvania, and William B. Elliot has been retained as collector. The consolidated district will be known as the First District.

GOLD SALES FOR AUGUST.

The Assistant Treasurer at New York has been directed by the Secretary of the Treasury to sell gold during the month of August as follows, viz: One and a half million on the first and third Thursdays each, and one million on the second and fourth Thursdays each. The total amount to be sold is five million dollars.

COINAGE.

The following is the full report of the operations of the different mints throughout the country for the fiscal year, completed June 30, 1875, in the office of the director of the mints. The first table covers the coinage of the mint of Philadelphia:
